THE LARGEST TREE IN THE WORLD.—There is a cedar tree growing in the mountains of Calaveras county, about 20 miles north-east of Murphy's, which is said to be the largest tree in the world. A correspondent of the Sonora Herald, who recently made an excursion to see it, thus describes it: "At the ground its circumference was 92 feet; four feet above that it was 88; and ten feet above that it was 61 feet in circumference; and after that the tapering of the shaft was very gradual. Its height, as measured by Captain H—, is 300 feet, but we made it but 285. This tree is by no means a deformity, as most trees with large trunks are. It is, throughout, one of perfect symmetry, while its enormous proportions inspire the beholder with emotions of awe and sublimity. Elegance and beauty are inseparable concomitants of its grandeur. I have said that this is the largest tree yet discovered in the world. It is so. The celebrated tree of Freemont would have to grow many centuries before it could pretend to be called anything but a younger brother. It is said that a tree was once found in Senegal, in Africa, whose trunk measured 90 feet in circumference. But no one has ever been able to find it since its first discovery. It is called by the natives 'baobab'; by botanists, 'Adansonia digitata.' But it is admitted that none can now be found with a circumference greater than 81 feet. There is a tree in Mexico, called the 'taxodium,' which is said to be 117 feet in circumference, but some have said that it is formed by the union of several trees. The height of all these foreign trees is not more, in any case, than 70 feet; and none of the trunks are more than 10 feet. The age of the mammoth cedar of California, if each zone may be reckoned one year, is about 2520 years. A section of the wood which I brought home with me, exclusive of the sap, which is but little more than one inch thick, numbers about 14 zones or grains to the inch. At that rate, if it were permitted to grow, it would increase its diameter one-seventh of an inch every year. In 84 years its diameter would be increased one foot; in 840 years 10 feet—so that it would then be 40 feet in diameter, and 120 feet in circumference. This giant of the woods and of the world is to be flayed, literally. The patriotic process has already commenced. We understand that the bark, which is at the base 14 inches thick, is to be taken off in sections to the height of 20 feet, and sent to the World's Fair in the city of New York."

FACETIE.

WHY is new bread like a caterpillar? Because is the grub which makes the butterfly.

AN INNOCENT QUERIST.—"Ma, has your tongue got legs?" "Got what, child?" "Got legs, ma?" "Certainly not; but why do you ask that silly question?" "Oh, nothing; only I heard pa say your tongue was running from morning till night."

PATIENCE AND LATE HOURS.—Wives are often foolish enough to sit up for their husbands, but you hear of very few husbands who have the patience to sit up for their wives.

A LANDED MAN.—"I say, Mr. W., I am seriously thinking of going out to Australia." "The very best thing you can do, John, for the moment you arrive there you will be a 'landed' gentleman."

RETORT.—"I go through my work," as the needle said to the idle boy. "But not till you are hard pushed," as the idle boy said to the needle.

WHY are soldiers like clocks? Because their first duty is to "mark time."

A pretty woman is like a great truth or a great happiness, and has no more right to bundle herself up under a green veil, or any other similar abomination, than the sun has to put on spectacles.

The latest novelty in the way of business is furnishing a man with a hat, and his own daguerreotype on the inside of it. A hatter advertises to do so.

The modesty of certain ambitious persons consists in becoming great without making too much noise; it may be said that they advance in the world on tip-toe.

NAOMA, the daughter of Enoch, was 580 years old when she married. Courage, ladies.

PAY AS YOU GO.—This is a charming proverb. A sixpenny loaf of bread without butter, and no debt on it, has a better relish than your best dinner that is to be paid for to-morrow.

"Ah, Mr. Simpkins, we have not chairs enough for our company," said a gay young wife to her frugal husband. "Plenty of chairs, ducky; but a little too much company," replied Mr. Simpkins.

If dull weather affects you, marry a warm-hearted girl, and make a sunshine for yourself. Bachelors will find this far superior to either billiards or Burgundy.

PILL OR POTION.—During a recent performance of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, the fair Juliet's question in the soliloquy, before taking the sleeping draught, "What if this mixture do not work at all?" was answered by an urchin in the pit with, "Then take a dose of pills!"

LIGHT SUMMER HATS.—The ladies of South America, during the hot weather of July, wear cabbage-leaves for bonnets, trimmed with radishes. What a horticultural idea!

THERE is an anecdote of Sheridan and a certain baronet, that, both being drunk in the streets, the baronet fell into the gutter; and Sheridan, having in vain endeavoured to get him upon his legs again, stammered out: "My dear friend, I cannot help you; but I'll do all I can for you—I'll lie down in the dirt with you!"

WITCHCRAFT.—A party residing in a pretty little village near Elgin had a cow taken ill some time ago; and as neither the head of the house nor any of the junior branches could understand the nature of the complaint, the opinion of one of the patriarchs of the village was asked; and he being equally at fault as to the malady of Crummie, it was sagely concluded among the parties that she was bewitched. Without delay, quantities of the "rowan tree and the red thread" were distributed through the "neuks and cranies" of the byre; and the female members of the family got bits of the charmed wood to carry in their pockets, in order to protect them from "cantrip wit." As neither the rowan tree in the "crap o' the wa," nor the horse-shoe "aboon the doorhead," seemed to bring any relief to the distressed quadruped, there is no saying what might have been the next resolve of the "wise men of Gotham" who had the case under consideration, had not a less superstitious neighbour suggested a more substantial remedy, which eventually proved effectual, and saved them from further absurdity.

EFFECTS OF A DRAUGHT.—An anti-teetotaler, who had his load on, "fetched up" against the side of a house, which had been newly painted. Shoving himself clear by a vigorous effort, he took one glimpse at his shoulder, another at the house, a third at his hand, and then exclaimed: "Well, that are a darn'd careless trick in who-ever painted that house, to leave it standing out all night for the people to run against!"

WEDDING DIVINATION.—Being lately present on the occasion of a wedding, at a town in the East Riding of Yorkshire, I was witness to the following custom, which seems to take rank as a genuine scrap of folk-lore. On the bride alighting from her carriage at her father's door, a plate covered with morsels of bride's cake was flung from a window on the second storey upon the heads of the crowd congregated in the street below; and the divination, I was told, consists in observing the fate which attends its downfall. If it reach the ground in safety, without being broken, the omen is a most unfavourable one. If, on the other hand, the plate be shattered to pieces (and the more the better), the auspices are looked upon as most happy.—Notes and Queries.

A fellow who wished to obtain an introduction to a young lady he saw in the street, one evening got a companion to go and offer his company, and while he was thus engaged, he came up and knocked him down for insulting the lady, and of course "protected" the fair one home.

WHILE a miser was on his death-bed, a tallow candle was burning upon the stand, and a flickering flame in the fire-place. He watched the candle and then the fire. Suddenly he called his son: "Come here." The son approached his bed-side, when the old man whispered: "Blow out that candle; tallow's most as dear as butter."

GROCERS who sell burnt peas for "old government Java" should remember their latter end, and bear in mind that "Jordan is a hard road to travel." Things are not judged by their "labels" in the next world.

A wag, at an evening party, was introduced to a lady whom he afterwards described as being so large that he could not get near enough to speak with her.

THE FLIGHT OF TIME.

Fifty winters, fifty summers, fifty autumns, fifty springs, Will rise like flocks of birds before us, fluttering on their airy wings.

And when that time does come, then comes "rheumatiz" and head-ache, long nights and short sleeps, anxiety about the stock market, and decided conviction that chickens and turkeys are less tender than they used to be.

ONE of the first things that seizes upon the attention of the traveller in Egypt is the queer dishes which he meets with. A person writing from Luxor, says that his first dinner on the Nile consisted of stewed hippopotamus and a broiled ibis. The next morning's breakfast consisted of cold crocodile, hashed camel, and the fossil remains of a donkey.

A farmer who was known to be a tight-fisted and parsimonious man, went to his landlord to pay his rent. Putting on a long face to correspond with the times, on entering the house, he said the times had been so hard, he couldn't raise the money at all, and dashing a bundle of bank-notes on the table: "There," said he, "that's all I can pay!" The money was taken up and counted by Mr. —, the landlord, who said: "Why, this is twice as much as you owe me!" "Dang'ee, give it to me again!" said the farmer; "I'm dashed if I ain't took it out of the wrong pocket!"

MRS. CHAPONE was asked the reason why she always came so early to church. "Because," said she, "it is no part of my religion to disturb the religion of others."

PROVOKING.—To kneel before your goddess, and burst both pantaloons straps.

EPIGRAM.

Joe hates a hypocrite, which plainly shows
Self-love is not a fault of Joe's.

COUNTING THE PIGS.—"Dick," said a master to his servant, "have you fed the pigs?" "Yes, massa, me fed um." "Did you count them, Dick?" "Yes, massa, all but one—dare be one little speckled pig, he frisk about so much, me couldn't count him."

A SINGULAR FORGIVENESS.—Sir Walter Scott, in his article in the Quarterly Review, on the Culloden papers, mentions a characteristic instance of an old Highland warrior's mode of pardon. "You must forgive even your bitterest enemy, Kenmuir, now," said the confessor to him, as he lay gasping on his death-bed. "Well, if I must, I must," replied the chieftain; "but my curse be on you, Donald," turning towards his son, "if you forgive him!"

LOSS OF TIME.—A devotee lamented to her confessor her love of gaming. "Ah, madam (replied the priest), it is a grievous sin—in the first place consider the loss of time." "Yes (replied the fair penitent), I have often begrudged the time that is lost in shuffling and dealing."

CANDID.—"You have visited my daughter a long time," said an anxious mother to a young gentleman of our acquaintance, the other day. "What are your intentions, sir?" "Honourable—entirely so!" said the gentleman. "I intend backing out, as the coachman say!"

AWKWARD MISTAKE.—A fine stone church was lately built in Missouri, upon the façade of which a stone-cutter was ordered to cut the following, as an inscription: "My house shall be called the house of prayer." He was referred, for accuracy, to the verse of Scripture in which these words occur; but, unfortunately, to the scandal of the society, he transcribed the whole verse—"My house shall be called a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves!"

SAM SLICK'S NOTION OF REFORM.—A good man don't talk of his religion for everlasting, and a good subject finds he has as much liberty as is good for him or his neighbour. Piety ain't found in pot-houses, nor patriotism in mobs or mass meetin's. Don't trade with a man that is over sanctimonious, or you will be taken in; or be too thick with a demagogue, or you may be taken up. Fermentation throws up scum, and agitation brings rascality to the top of the pot. For my part I hate politics. There are cleaner things to handle, and pleasanter to smell. There are two kinds of reforms in the world—personal reforms and reforms in the state. Now, personal reforms can be made at any time we like—so we just put them off until it is convenient; and sometimes we consait we can do without them at all. At all events, it's like takin' physic: it's hard to swallow, and causes vry faces. Reforms in the state are pretty things, and show wisdom. I never met a man yet that hadn't some little pet scheme of reform for the public—the most disinterested one, too, in the world—for statesmen are very disinterested cattle.

In Leigh Hunt's Indicator, we find the following pleasant sally, descriptive of a hot day: "Now a fellow who finds he has three miles further to go, in a pair of tight shoes, is in a pretty situation. Now the apothecary's apprentice, with a bitterness beyond aloe, thinks of the pond he used to bathe in at school. Now the lounge, who cannot resist riding his new horse, feels his boots burn him. Now, jockeys, walking in great coats to lose flesh, curse inwardly. Now five fat people in a stage-coach, hate the sixth fat one, who is coming in, and think he has no right to be so large! Now bakers look vicious, and cooks are aggravated."

FONTENELLE.—An agreeable young lady having addressed Fontenelle thus: "Can you explain, sir, the difference between myself and a clock?" the gallant old philosopher immediately replied: "The difference is, that a clock enables us to remember the hours, whilst you, fair lady, cause us to forget them."

LAWYERS.—"A lawyer," said Lord Brougham—in a facetious mood—"is a learned gentleman who rescues your estate from your enemies, and keeps it himself."

GASCONADES.—A Gascon and a Parisian having quarrelled, their friends endeavoured to reconcile them, which having accomplished, the Gascon, turning to the Parisian, congratulated him on the result, "for," said he, "had I been in a bad humour I should have seized you, and thrown you so high that the flies would have had time to devour you before you came down again."

LOST IN A FOG.—"Suppose you are lost in a fog," said Lord C—to his noble relative, the Marchioness, "what are you most likely to be?" "Mist, of course," replied her ladyship.

PRINTED SERMONS.—In a manse in Fife, the conversation of a large party, one evening, turned on a volume of sermons which had just been published, with considerable success, and was supposed to have brought a round sum into the hands of the author. When the minister's wife heard of what had been made by the volume, her imagination was excited, and, turning to her husband, who sat a little aside, she said: "My dear, I see nothing to hinder you to print a few of your sermons, too!" "They were a' printed lang syne!" said the candid minister in his wife's ear.

JOCKEYSHIP.—An auctioneer, speaking to a horse-dealer about the situation of an estate he was to sell, in a level neighbourhood, said: "The country is exceedingly beautiful, and I do so admire a rich flat." "So do I sir!" said the grinning jockey.

AN HIBERNIAN M.P.—An Irish member, whose name we will not mention, having risen, was assailed by loud cries of "Spoke! Spoke!" meaning, that having spoken once already, he had no right to do it a second time. He had evidently a second speech struggling in his breast for an introduction into the world, when seeing, after remaining for some time on his legs, that there was not the slightest chance of being suffered to deliver a sentence of it, he observed, with imperturbable gravity, and in a rich Tipperary brogue: "If honourable gentlemen suppose that I was going to spake again, they are quite mistaken! I merely rose for the purpose of saying, that I had nothing more to say on the subject!" The house was convulsed with laughter, for a few seconds afterwards, at the exceeding ready wit of the Hibernian M.P.

FORENSIC ELOQUENCE.—The American Wheeling Gazette gives the following, as an extract from the recent address of a barrister "out west," to a jury: "The law expressly declares, gentlemen, in the beautiful language of Shakespeare, that where no doubt exists of the guilt of the prisoner, it is your duty to fetch him in innocent. If you keep this fact in view, in the case of my client, gentlemen, you will have the honour of making a friend of him and all his relations, and you can allers look upon this occasion and reflect, with pleasure, that you have done as you would be done by. But if, on the other hand, you disregard the principle of law, and set at naught my eloquent remarks, and fetch him in guilty, the silent twitches of conscience will follow you over every fair corn-field, I reckon, and my injured and down-trodden client will be apt to light on you one of these dark nights, as my cat lights on a sasserful of new milk."

A couple of sharpers took lodgings at a hostelry in the country, and fared sumptuously, drinking two or three bottles of wine daily. The last day a dispute arose about the speed of their horses, and they at last agreed to enter on the proposed contest. The landlord was appointed judge, each being the rider of his own horse. When they were mounted, the judge, like those at the Olympic games, gave the words, "One, two, three, and go!" Off they went, and have never been seen or heard of since—leaving the landlord fully compensated by having had the honour to be their judge.

SAM SLICK'S CAUCUS MEETING.—"Thinks I to myself: Sam, you'd better be a movin' too. You're gettin' over head and ears in love as fast as you can, and are as soft as if you never seed a gall afore. So says I: 'Sophy, sposin' Mary and you and I take a walk down to the beach, and I will send a note on board to the captain.' And I took out a pencil, and wrote to him an invite. Well, as soon as she went to get ready, I called a council of war, and held a regular caucus meetin' between my head and my heart. So I puts my elbows on the table, and clasps my face in my hands, and opened the session. 'Sam,' says I, 'what do you think of this gall?' 'She's hand-ome enough to eat.' 'Will she do for transplanin' to Slickville?' 'The identical thing.' 'What do you intend to do?' 'Well, that's exactly what I want to know.' 'Will she take you?' 'It's more than I can tell.' 'You ain't a Bluenose.' 'I am glad of it.' 'You're a clockmaker.' 'I ain't ashamed of it: and if she is, she's a fool." "You ain't young." "That's a fact." "Not much looks to brag on." "That's true." "And talk Yankee into the bargain." "I can't help it." "Well you've wrote some books?" "Let her take the books then, and leave me." "But ain't she the finest gail you ever did lay eyes on?" "And the sweetest?" "Lick!" "And modest, and all that?" "Yes, all that, and the double of that multiplied by ten." "Up, then, and at her like a man." "What, give up all my prudence? Offer on half-a-day's acquaintance, and have all the rest of my life to find out her faults. Women ain't hosses, and they want to be put thro' their paces, and have their wind tried. If I'm took in, it will be myself that did it; and that ain't like Sam Slick, is it?" "Well, it ain't, that's a fact." "What a cursed thing love is! It puts you in a twitteration all over just when you ought to be cool, and turns a wise man into a born fool. "Sleep on it." You've just hit it, says I. Now you talk sense; you are gettin' to be yourself agin."—Sam Slick's Wise Sawes.

A LAWYER'S PETITION.—A young aspirant to legal fame, residing not more than twenty miles from Doncaster, being anxious to be appointed a perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, pursuant to a late Act of Parliament, petitioned the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas for the purpose, and concluded his petition in the following words:—"Solemnly declares it to be his wishes and intention to marry as soon as he can take advantage of an eligible choice, and go through such an important ceremony reverently, discreetly, advisedly, and soberly!"—Doncaster Gazette.

SENSIBLE YOUNG LADIES.—The young ladies of Rochester have recently formed themselves into a society for mutual improvement and protection. Among the resolutions adopted at a regular meeting, we find the following:—"That we will marry no young man who is not a patron of THE LONDON JOURNAL; for we have thus not only strong evidence of his want of intelligence, but that he will prove too stingy to provide for his family, educate his children, or encourage institutions of learning in his vicinity."

YANKEE INGENUITY.—In some of our towns we don't allow smokin' in the streets, though in most of them we do; and where it is agin law, it is two dollars fine in a general way. Well, Sassy went down to Boston, to do a little chore of business there, where this law was, only he didn't know it. So soon as he gets off the coach, he outs with his case, takes a cigar, lights it, and walks on, smoking like a furnace flue. No sooner said than done. Up steps constable, and says, "I'll trouble you for two dollars, for smokin' agin law in the streets." Sassy was as quick as wink on him. "Smokin'!" says he, "I warn't a smokin'." "O, my!" says constable, "how you talk, man! I won't say you lie, 'cause it aint polite, but its very like the way I talk when I fib. Didn't I see you with my own eyes?" "No," says Sassy, "you didn't. It don't do always to believe your own eyes—they can't be depended on more than other people's. I never trust mine, I can assure you. I own I had a cigar in my mouth, but it was because I liked the flavour of tobacco, but not to smoke. I take it don't convene with the dignity of a free and enlightened citizen of our almighty nation to break the law, seein' that he makes the law himself, and is his own sovereign, and is his own subject, too. No I warn't smokin', and if you don't believe me, try this cigar yourself, and see if it aint so. It hain't got no fire in it." Well, constable takes the cigar, puts it into his mug, and draws away at it, and out comes the smoke like anythin'. "I'll trouble you for two dollars, Mr. High Sheriff's representative," says Sassy, "for smokin' in the streets: do you under-stand, my old 'coon?" Well, constable was taken all aback—he was finely bit. "Stranger," says he, "where was you raised?" "To Canady line," says Sassy. "Well, says he, 'you're a credit to your brightens up. Well, let the fine drop, for we are about even, I guess.'"—Sam Slick.

SAM SLICK HOOKING LUCY'S GOWN.—Well, just as I was ready to start away, down comes Lucy to the 'keepin' room, with both arms behind her head, a fixin' of the hooks and eyes. "Man alive," says she, "are you here yet? I thought you was off gunnin' an hour ago; who'd a thought you was here?" "Gunnin'?" says I, "Lucy, my gunnin' is over; I shan't go no more now—I shall go home; I agree with you; shiverin' alone under a wet bush for hours is no fun; but if Lucy was there —" "Get out!" says she, "don't talk nonsense, Sam, and just fasten the other hook and eye of my frock, will you?" She turned round her back to me. Well, I took the hook in one hand and the eye in the other; but arth and seas! my eyes fairly snapped again; I never see such a neck since I was raised. It sprung right out o' the breast and shoulder, full round, and then tapered up to the head like a swan's, and the complexion would beat the most delicate white and red rose that ever was seen. Lick, it made me all eyes! I jist stood stock still—I couldn't move a finger if I was to die for it. "What ails you, Sam," says she, "that you don't hook it?" "Why," says I, "Lucy, dear, my fingers is all thumbs, that's a fact; I can't handle such little things as fast as you can." "Well, come," says she, "make haste, that's a dear—mother will be a comin' directly," and at last I shut too both my eyes, and fastened it: and when I talk dore, says I, "There is one thing I must say, Lucy." "What's that?" says she. "That you may stimp all Connecticut to show such an agnelliforous neck as you have—I never saw the beat of it in all my born days—it's the most —" "And you may stimp the State, too," says she, "to produce such another bold, forrad, impudent, onmannerly tomme as you have! So there now—so get along with you!"

A CASE IN PINT.—On what model has the India Bill been formed? On that of a pale ale bottle, one would think—for it seems to be a very insufficient measure.—Punch.

PENUCIARY DEMANDS.—Of all men it must be confessed that the tax-gatherer has the most calls for his money.—Ibid.

ANOTHER GRIEVANCE.—Westminster Bridge—the new one—is, according to Sir William Molesworth, to be built of stone from Ireland. Another evidence of the eagerness of the Saxon to trample upon everything Irish.—Ibid.

LAYING IT ON THICK.—Of a certain author—or artist—or actor—or somebody else—who had acquired much notoriety by laudatory criticisms—it was said that his reputation was built of plaster.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

THE TEACHING OF NECESSITY.—A grand necessity elevates man; a small one degrades him.

A REFLECTION FOR THE GREAT.—We are little by being seen among men: because that phasis of us only is visible which is exposed towards them, and which most resembles them; we become greater by leaving the world, as the sun appears to be on descending below the horizon. Strange reflection! humiliating truth! that nothing on earth—no exertion, no endowment—can do so much for us as a distant day.

ADMIRATION AT DEATH.—The sun colours the sky most diffusely when he bath sunk below the horizon; and they who never said, "How beneficently he shines!" say at last, "How brightly he set!"

AGREEMENT.—He who agrees with himself agrees with others. It has struck me that I believe in the truth of those ideas only which are productive to my mind, which assimilate to my modes of thinking, and assist my progress. For it is not only possible, but also very natural, that such an idea does not assimilate to other minds—that, instead of assisting, it impedes their progress, and that they think it wrong and erroneous. Any one who is convinced of this will never engage in a controversy.

ENMITIES AND DIFFERENCES.—As horses start aside from objects they see imperfectly, so do men. Enmities are excited by an indistinct view; they would be allayed by conference. Look at any long avenue of trees by which the traveller on our principal highways is protected from the sun. Those at the beginning are wide apart; but those at the end almost meet. Thus happens it frequently in opinions. Men who were far asunder, come nearer and nearer in the course of life, if they have strength enough to quell, or good sense enough to temper and assuage their earlier animosities.

LIFE AND DEATH.—When we are born we are the same as others; at our decease, we may induce our friends and oblige our enemies to acknowledge that others are not the same as we. It is folly to say death levels the whole human race—for it is only when he hath stripped men of everything external, that their deformities can be clearly discovered, or their worth correctly ascertained. Gratitude is soon silent; a little while longer and ingratitude is tired, is satisfied, is exhausted, or sleeps. Lastly fly off the fumes of party-spirit—the hottest and most putrid ebullition of self-love. We then see before us, and contemplate calmly, the creator of our customs, the ruler of our passions, the arbiter of our pleasures, and, under the gods, the disposer of our destiny. What then, I pray thee, is there dead? Nothing more than that which we can handle, cast down, bury; and surely not he who is yet to progenerate a more numerous and far better race, than during the few years it was permitted us to converse with him.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SLANG EXPRESSIONS.—It would be curious to investigate how some odd forms of expression have crept into, if not the English language, at least into every-day parlance; and by what classes of men they have been introduced. I do not, of course, mean the vile argot, or St. Giles's Greek, prevalent among housebreakers and pick-pockets; though a great deal of that is traceable to the Romany or gipsy language, and other sufficiently odd sources: but I allude more particularly to phrases used by even educated men—such as "a regular mull," "bosh," "just the cheese," &c. The first has already been proved an importation from our Anglo-Indian friends. Bosh, used by us in the sense of "nonsense," "rubbish," is a Persian word meaning "dirty;" and cheese, a corruption of a Hindostani word denoting "thing," which is exactly the sense of the expression I have quoted. "Just the cheese," "quite the cheese"—i.e. just the thing I require, quite comme il faut, &c.—Notes and Queries.

A STRANGE STORY.—A workwoman lately went to a boarding-school for girls, in the Rue des Fontaines, and said that she was sent by the mother of a little girl, named Adèle Gage, aged eight years, to require her to be sent home. The child was given up to her, and she took her to her own residence. She fastened herself with her in her room, and then tied the child's hands behind her back, put a gag in her mouth, and endeavoured to strangle her; but the child broke from her. She then said, "Well, I will not kill you in that way; but you shall die with me in another!" She thereupon unbanded the child; and, after carefully closing every crevice by which air could enter, lighted two pans of charcoal. In a short time the woman became insensible; but, as often happens, the fumes produced little effect on the child; and when she saw the woman fall she opened the window. The air caused the woman to revive. She appeared greatly surprised at seeing the child alive. She then intimated that she would abandon the idea of killing her, and took her home to her parents, saying that she had taken her out for a walk. Seeing that Adèle was very pale, her mother interrogated her; and she told all that had passed. The commissary of police made an investigation; and the result of it was, that the child's tale was confirmed. The woman was arrested. It appears that she had had an intrigue with the child's uncle; and that, having been abandoned by him, had resolved to kill her as an act of revenge—she knowing that he was very fond of her.—Paris Paper.

CURIOUS POSTHUMOUS OCCURRENCE.—If the following be true, though in ever so limited a manner, it deserves investigation. Notwithstanding his twenty-three years' experience, the worthy grave-digger must have been mistaken, unless there is something peculiar in the bodies of Bath people. But if the face turns down in any instance, as asserted, it would be right to ascertain the cause, and why this change is not general. It is now about twenty years since the paragraph appeared in the London papers. "A correspondent in the Bath Herald states the following singular circumstance: 'Having occasion last week to inspect a grave in one of the parishes of this city, in which two or three members of a family had been buried some years since, and which lay in very wet ground, I observed that the upper part of the coffin was rotted away, and had left the head and bones of the skull exposed to view. On inquiring of the grave-digger how it came to pass that I did not observe the usual sockets of the eyes in the skull, he replied, that what I saw was the hind part of the head (termed the occiput, I believe, by anatomists), and that the face was turned, as usual, to the earth. Not exactly understanding his phrase, 'as usual,' I inquired if the body had been buried with the face upwards, as in the ordinary way: to which he replied, to my astonishment, in the affirmative, adding, that in the course of decomposition the face of every individual turns to the earth, and that, in the experience of three-and-twenty years in his situation, he had never known more than one instance to the contrary.'"—Notes and Queries.

WALKING UNDER WATER AT PARIS.—Among the marvels of the day must be reckoned M. Saint-Simon Sicard's invention of an apparatus which permits the possessor to take a half-hour's promenade at the bottom of a river, and there occupy himself as fancy suggests—from flirting with mermaids to rescuing "moist bodies." M. Grandchamp made a public experiment the other day, and remained thirty-five minutes at the bottom of the Seine. This is all we can learn of its construction: A complete clothing of caoutchouc from head to foot, including helmet and sock, allows the wearer to descend below the water without danger of contact; the helmet has a valve, which allows the air to escape at the moment of submersion; and no sooner is the submersion complete, than the pressure of the water closes the valve hermetically. A provision of air to be inspired is carried in a box, placed like a hump in the back of the cuirass of caoutchouc. This box has a tube which carries the air into the helmet, in order that the breathing may take place without effort; and a little stop-cock enables the distribution of air to be regulated at pleasure. No sooner is there a difficulty of breathing than a signal is given, and the experimenter is brought to the surface once more.

THE ADJUSTMENT OF OUR SYSTEM.

WHEN the little snowdrop, which in our garden-walks we may see raising its beautiful head, to remind us that spring is at hand, was created, that the whole mass of the earth, from pole to pole, and from circumference to centre, must have been taken into account and weighed, in order that the proper degree of strength might be given to the fibres even of this little plant. Botanists tell us, that the constitution of this plant is such as to require that, at a certain stage of its growth, the stalk should bend, and the flower should bow its head, that an operation may take place, which is necessary, in order that the herb should produce seed after its kind; and that, after this, its vegetable health requires that it should lift its head again, and stand erect. Now, if the mass of the earth had been greater or less, the force of gravity would have been different. In that case, the strength of fibre in the snowdrop, as it is, would have been too much or too little. The plant could not bow or raise its head at the right time: fecundation could not take place, and its family would have become extinct with the first individual that was planted; because its "seed" would not have been "in itself," and therefore it could not re-produce itself. Now, if we see such perfect adaptation—such exquisite adjustment in the case of one of the smallest flowers of the field, how much more may we not expect "compensation" in the atmosphere—upon the right adjustment and due performance of which depends, not only the life of that plant, but the well-being of every individual that is found in the entire vegetable and animal kingdoms of the world. When the east winds blow for a little while, they bring us air saturated with moisture from the gulf-stream, and we complain of the sultry, oppressive, heavy atmosphere. The invalid grows worse, and the well man feels ill; because, when he takes this atmosphere into his lungs, it is already so charged with moisture that it cannot take up and carry off that which incumbers his lungs, and which nature has caused to be deposited there, that this atmosphere may take up and carry off. At other times the air is dry and hot: we feel that it is conveying off matter from the lungs too fast; he realises the idea that it is consuming him, and he calls it "parching!"

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

D. B. would be glad to be informed of the best authorities for further information as regards the Celtic races—especially that portion which inhabited Ireland. We could refer him to a hundred, but in the hope of having our attention directed to some rare French or German works, we publish his request.

JOE BEANS.—Neither the Prince of Wales nor the Duke of York have been gazetted to any military honours. In the Royal Navy they would have to serve the stated periods, like other boys, before receiving responsible appointments.

X. Y. Z.—A man born in Ireland is of course an Irishman—but that is the local idea; for, in point of fact and law, he is as much an Englishman as one born in the belfry of Bow Church would be. We are happy to perceive that there is a promise of the stupid distinctions, English, Irish, Scotch, Welch, &c., being destroyed. All belong to one family, and the correct designation is "British."

A. Z.—Any polished metal or wood may be lacquered so as to impart the appearance of gold. The following will give a deep-coloured gold: Seed-lac three ounces, turmeric one ounce, dragon's blood a quarter of a pound, alcohol one pint. These ingredients must digest for a week, be frequently shaken, and then decanted and filtered for use.

C. A.—The nails may be whitened by using the following wash: Diluted sulphuric acid two drachms, tincture of myrrh one drachm, spring-water four ounces. The nails must be first cleansed with white soap, and then the fingers are to be dipped into the wash.

RICARDO, CREMORNE, & J. W. L. each love a lady, but have not courage to declare their passion. Modesty in such cases is rather a fault than a virtue. If nice etiquette in such matters were always to be observed, our young men and women would be monks and nuns. Our correspondents must be informed that making love is as natural and proper as eating a dinner. All that a lover requires in the presence of his lady-love, is a little of what the French term abandon. Too much formality quakerises and debases the passion.

J. C.—If a woman is always looking at you, what does she mean? Why, something either very complimentary or very disparaging. But generally a staring woman is insufferably vulgar. Avoid her, unless you are smitten in return. If you are, pop the question, and be married off-hand.

AUNT CHLOE.—It would be unkindly, unkind, and cruel to desert your lover now that misfortune has overtaken him. Your friends give you bad advice.

J. W. L.—The lady smiles at times—does she? Your friend ought to be a happy man. According to your account of him, he is very bashful. Do not be afraid of him—for if the lady continues smiling, he will soon conquer his timidity. The ice has been broken.

ANNIE L. naïvely asks: "Is it really so unusual a circumstance for a young lady to have attained the age of nineteen without having loved?" Some girls are very wise. They are not caught by every fly that glitters in the water. But when caught, they love fiercely. Annie, we suspect, is one of these elect—circumspet. Her turn is fast coming.

J. GRO. RICHER.—In polite circles, unmarried ladies are not addressed as "Miss," after a negative or an affirmative. The practice is decidedly boorish. Your name is of English origin.

PAULINE.—1. No. 2. Should a lady who has declined an offer of marriage, return the gentleman his letter of proposal? No; such an action would be improper and unladylike. 3. The men who stare at women are almost invariably disreputable in their manners and habits.

C. E. Z.—The charitable hospital for the treatment of distortions and spinal diseases, is 84, Norton Street. Patients are received into the house, but they have to pay a small fixed weekly sum for their board. There is also an asylum at Eastbourne, for those requiring sea air. The secretary is Charles Verral, Esq.

P. L.—SHAVING PASTE: Melt together an ounce of almond oil and an ounce of white wax, and add gradually an ounce of rose-water, and an ounce of shavings of Castile soap.

A FOREIGN HEIR.—All law cases involving nice, obscure, new, or interesting points of law, are faithfully reported in the serials devoted to legal matters.

MANFRED.—Yours is calf-love, and your sister treats it as such. Still she should not tap at the window when you are paying a visit to your adorable. Tell her she is very rude. When your whiskers have budded, and your strut has become a stride, you will know what love is. Boyish love is boyish nonsense. The girls laugh at it.

JUNE 30.—With your mother on your side, what have you to fear? Your father will be sure to yield. Besides, you ought to pay some deference to his authority. At all events, avoid a clandestine courtship—it is both disgraceful and dangerous.

CANTERBURY BELL is something of a male coquette. He loves and he does not love. He commits an indiscretion, and because the girl will not yield to his solicitation to afford him an explanation of her shyness, he forthwith pays his addresses to another, and wins her heart. He has the soul of a costermonger or a vagabond gipsy. Perhaps he would like to be a butterfly. Unless he alters, he will live to earn the contempt of his wife—and then what would be his fate?

IGNORAMUS takes us to task for saying that polygamy was only a sin in the countries that had accepted the Christian dispensation. As we like both sides of a question stated, we quote a few of his remarks. "If polygamy," he writes, "is a sin in England, it is also a sin in Turkey; unless there is one (Divine) law for the Jew and another for the Greek. If it be admitted that polygamy is not a sin in Turkey, must we not admit that polygamy is not a sin in Utah? If we justify Mussulmen in this practice, may we not grant the same boon to the 'Mormons,' seeing they consider it a 'natural' as well as a 'divine' institution? Again, if it is natural in India and China, and the people of those countries can practise it with impunity, may it not be equally as 'natural' in France and England?" Our correspondent has fallen into the common error of paying too little attention to the natural law. For ages monogamy has been the practice of Western and Northern Europe. Polygamy for ages has been the practice of the East, where, owing to the deteriorations in the population, the females far exceed the males in number. Dr. Walker, the physiologist, in a valuable treatise, satisfactorily disposes of this subject.

L. E. L.—The origin of the freemen, or old burgesses, in our towns and cities, may be briefly explained. For centuries the people, in the modern sense of the word, were in political abeyance—the majority were serfs, and the management of the government continued to descend through series of kings and nobles, without their acquiescence being ever in the slightest degree considered necessary. But as estates became to be divided and population increased, serfdom decreased, and the towns sprang into existence. This led to the earliest creation of a popular franchise. These towns formed themselves into corporations for defensive purposes; and those who were entitled by birth, residence, apprenticeship, or election, to have a voice in the management of their local affairs, were called burgesses or freemen—and this hereditary franchise subsisted until the passing of the Reform Act, when it was modified, with the view to its ultimate extinction; but the original institution still exists, to the no little scandal of all grades of politicians.

H. B.—A lady whom you have long known, breaks off the friendly acquaintanceship, without deigning to offer the slightest explanation. What are you to do? Why, accept the "cut" with the best possible grace, and show that if you have not deserved it, you do not care about resenting it. Can you lay the flattering unction to your soul, and say you have committed no action which would oblige her, as a respectable woman who valued her reputation, to shun your society? In all such affairs there are wheels within wheels.

X. Y. Z., of Hollings Green, is one of those pests to the press and literary gentlemen—a would-be contributor. He belongs to a class that would do any dirty work, lie, slander, or steal, rather than earn a living by laborious and responsible industry. Under the evaporation of gin, and no doubt some chagrin at his numerous and deserved failures, he takes us to task for proving, as we have incontestably done over and over again, that this is the 53rd year of the century. He says it is the 54th. If his foggy, gin-muddled head can dissect the year 1, he will find it was not concluded until the 31st of December, 1. Time, as represented by the numeral of the year, is cumulative, and for the purposes of our era, the present notation commenced 1st January, 1—so that the numeral representing the year must be prospective. Our era did not commence with the assumption—we might say the deliberate falsehood—that a whole twelve months had elapsed before counting began. But it would be useless to attempt to reason with such slothful, crawling creatures. His missive teems with vulgar abuse, but as we have not the slightest desire to coax him from his natural obscurity, we can only hope that it is not infamous. As an eminent statesman, in replying to a titled dame, said lately, "when the bolts are rusty and the quiver battered, there is not much to fear from the attack."

ALICE AND JOHN.—The government proposition on Savings Banks presents commendable features. It is provided that the National Debt Commissioners shall have the power to appoint receivers to all these banks, independent of the trustees and managers—and who are to be paid such salaries as the said commissioners may determine; these receivers are not to pay or receive without the presence of a manager, and the trustees and managers are prohibited from receiving or paying; and on these conditions the country will be liable for the acts of such receiver; and unless the depositor's book is signed by the receiver, the depositor will have no claim in case of default. It is likewise provided that four days a year shall be set apart for depositors to produce their books to the auditors for examination, and that all those who do not so produce them shall forfeit their interest, and a list of such absentees be forwarded to the National Debt Office, and that interest shall not be restored without their consent. It is also provided that, from and after the 20th of November, the interest payable on deposits is to be two-and-a-half per cent.; but the depositors are allowed to direct the trustees to invest their savings, if above £50, from time to time with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and the interest to be payable through such savings banks. Another clause authorises the government to appoint receivers where there are no existing banks—and in such cases he would act alone, without the presence of managers. From this it will be seen that the depositors receive more security than they have hitherto done; but we think the government act unwise in not taking all these banks into their own hands. Let the nation be the working-man's banker.

JAMES M. LUCK.—You improve. The two verses are by no means poor.

REPLY TO AN EMIGRATING FRIEND.

Oh! cloud not yet thy youthful brow:
Bid gloom awhile depart;
For life but little tells thee now,
Its trials for thy heart.
Who'll guide thee with a gentle hand—
Fond hope, alas! how vain—
When lost to sight is that dear land
You ne'er might see again?
Soon o'er thy course might sorrow lour,
With no fond kindred nigh,
To soothe thee in a lonely hour,
Or heed thy troubled sigh.
No distant clime, nor glittering store
Can ease the heart of pain,
Tho' sever'd from the well-loved shore
You ne'er might see again.

A. D. M.—Let your solicitor prepare your will. A nuncupative testament—that is, a declaration of the testator in his last hours, in the presence of witnesses, is void. But the law allows what it terms a donatio mortis causa (a gift in anticipation of death): that is, when a person in his last sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers, or causes to be delivered to another, the possession of any personal goods, to keep in case of his decease. It is accompanied with the implied trust that, if the donor lives, the property shall revert to himself, being only given in contemplation of death. But, independently, a donatio mortis causa must be unconditional—the donee must take a beneficial interest. It is a very unsatisfactory mode of disposing of property, and should only be resorted to in a very extreme case. We may mention that this gift is liable to the legacy duty, and to the payment of debts on a deficiency of assets; but is exempted from the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts.

T. H. E.—As you have sown so you must reap. You winked at crime as long as it suited your purpose, and now, when you find your position embarrassing, you would ask for compensation. Your conscience is in an unsatisfactory condition, and as no jury would give you more than a farthing, you had better let your disgrace die away.

ZERO.—You have lost all chance of obtaining the young lady's affection, as your own story sufficiently attests. You fondly loved a young lady who is only seventeen for some time, but felt until lately that it would be improper to talk of love to one so young, and foolishly hoped that what you considered your discretion and self-denial would meet with their reward in the end. Alas, you have been woefully undeceived! At your last visit, you found she received the kind attentions of a young gentleman with great apparent satisfaction, and your eyes were fully opened on his addressing her as dear. You remarked quietly to her that Mr. — was "very familiar" on which she blushed, walked straight to him, took his arm, and asked him to take her for a walk in the shrubbery. Of course you felt like a demon at the moment—just like the naughty spirit in the tree in the garden of Eden. Your emotion betrayed you—for ever since the girl has treated you with marked coldness. You say your rival is handsome, richer, and more talented than yourself, and no flirt. Truly your case is hopeless—and we warn all young men similarly situated, to strike while the iron is hot. In love as in war, dull delay is fatal. Distant devotion pleases no young woman, however far-sighted and shrewd she may be. The soft clasping of hands, the music of vows oft repeated, and brilliant day-dreams of the future—these are what win the sex; and it is in the knowledge of this fact that lies the whole secret of the comparative boobies being more than a match in courtship for the men of susceptibility and talent. Most women prefer men of tact, courage, and audacity, to the timorous fools who think them angels, when they themselves well know they are only women who regard marriage as an obligation to be discharged as promptly as is practicable under the circumstances.

WILLIAM BAILEY.—Your opinions are precisely ours. We would not close any parks, gardens, or other place of public resort of the kind, on the Sunday afternoon; but we want the legislation to inform us what is Sunday? Opinions vary on the subject; and we seriously ask, is it a day of worship or a day of recreation—when does it commence and end? The latitudinarianism on this subject is not very creditable.

ANTONIA, an orphan, kindly provided with a situation in a shop, discovered by accident that the foreman was an immoral man—in short, that he was villainously ill-using a young woman whom he had betrayed. Since then Antonia has been subjected by him to every annoyance short of downright cruelty. Antonia must make her mistress acquainted with the facts. She owes that to herself; and as regards the man, it is a false sense of honour that would attempt to screen him.

A.—Cloth may be rendered waterproof in the following manner: Dissolve Indian-rubber in naphtha, so that it feels rather sticky between the thumb and finger, then stretch the cloth on a flat board or table, and with a hard clothes-brush, brush the surface clean, then dip a soft brush slightly into the varnish, and lay on the cloth as thin a coating as you can—the thinner the better. If you prepare a piece of linen or cotton, of the same shape and size, in the same way, and while the two surfaces are wet, lay them together and press them well—it will last much longer, and be more impervious to the wet.

MINNIE loves a young gentleman who formerly paid her great attention, but of late he has quite slighted her. She has had an offer from another gentleman. Is she to accept it or not? The last lover is very steady and industrious, but has not the same gentlemanly appearance as the former. Minnie clings to appearances—she thinks a fine exterior a charming recommendation. The partiality is natural, and she must wait awhile. It would be unjust to marry the second lover while doting on the first.

SANDY.—Self-worship is the most vain of all devotions, and the people of this country have grievously sinned in this respect. The Englishman boasts of his institutions and his own indomitable energy—the Scotchman of his industry—invariably, en passant, making the wild assertion that in his corner of the island there is "health in the breeze and shelter in the storm"—the Irishman glories in his courage, and indulges in the poetical exclamation that his country is "the first gem of the sea—first isle of the ocean." All three have a shrill trumpet on which to sound their individual praises; and there is this serious objection to their trumpeting, that they exult over traditions, rather than their present advanced condition. Why don't they brag about the ripe fruits that they are the means of throwing into the lap of industry—of their science, literature, and their unbounded contributions to the formation of a new and more brilliant era in the world's history?

BEN BRUST.—Scotch snuff sprinkled about the holes of resort will destroy crickets; another plan is to put the parings of cucumbers in their way—these they will greedily devour, and then soon die.

WOMAN AND HER MASTER.

CHAPTER I.

Women, by whom ye are—the source of joy—
With cruel wiles ye labour to destroy;
Vainly we fly—our ruin ye pursue,
Yet blame in us those arts first taught by you.
MARLOW.

THIRTY years ago, when railroads had only just commenced tracing their iron wrinkles on the fair face of merry England, the road between Colchester and London—the main artery connecting the eastern counties with the metropolis—was one of the most frequented in the kingdom, and certainly not the least beautiful, as a specimen of quiet English scenery.

The lands on either side of it were highly cultivated—snug, cosy, comfortable, fat-looking farm-houses nestled in shady nooks—neat villages, with their old-fashioned gable roofs, and picturesque churches, met the eye of the traveller at each fresh point of view. The whole country presented an image of content sleeping in the lap of plenty.

The farm-houses, villages, and churches, we are happy to inform our readers, still remain—but the road is comparatively deserted: the coaches, with their high-bred, mettlesome horses, glittering harness, and sleek, bustling drivers—an important class of persons in those days—have disappeared: the latter, "fallen from their high estate," as Dryden hath it, in many instances have degenerated into landlords of village ale-houses—or worse, been reduced to drive the "busses" which ply between the towns upon the line and the nearest stations.

The only exception to the beauty of the road was that portion of it which ran through Lexden Heath—a barren, wild, uncultivated waste, which commenced a short distance from Colchester: for miles it produced nothing but stunted grass and furze, or here and there a solitary tree, which, instead of relieving, rendered the desolation of the scene more apparent.

Considerable portions of the heath have since been reclaimed and planted; but sufficient remains in its original state to convey an idea to our readers—should they ever visit the spot—of the dreary, wretched waste it must have been at the period our tale commences.

On the fifteenth of November, eighteen hundred and twenty-three, about four o'clock in the afternoon, the Norwich Times, driven by Dick Gurney—"Honest Dick," as he was called—whose exterior was rough and unseemly as the shell of the cashew nut, but whose heart resembled the ripe, melting kernel within—was seen making its way over Lexden Heath. A cold, easterly wind had seized upon the faces of the outside passengers, pinching and puckering the features of the old, till they resembled frost-bitten pippins, and changing the ruddy glow of health upon the cheeks of the young to a sort of stagnant, purple hue.

The rain, too, fell in torrents; down it came—splash, splash—upon the oil-skin umbrellas, with a dull, monotonous sound, then poured off in continuous streams upon the roof and seats of the coach, or, by way of agreeable variety, over the shoulders or down the necks of the passengers, who were too wretched even to grumble at each other, but sat with desperate resignation, patiently enduring the discomforts they could not escape.

The day was indeed a bitter one: the sky presented a dense, unbroken mass of clouds—not a rent in them for a ray of sun to peep through—and the heath looked more than usually desolate. No living thing was to be seen—not even a solitary rook returning to its nest—all had sought some shelter. Charity herself had scarcely ventured forth on such a day, upon her errand of love and mercy.

Still Dick continued to drive steadily on, till he reached a sharp turning in the road, about a mile distant from the house where he changed horses, when he suddenly drew up: several frost-bitten noses emerged from the thick woollen comforters of the passengers, and more than one voice demanded if anything was the matter.

"I should think there was!" answered the coachman, in a tone of commiseration; "look there!"

He pointed with his whip to the figure of a female, decently but thinly clad, crouching at the foot of an old oak tree, whose leafless branches groaned and sighed, as they waved in the blast over her head, as though instinct with human love and pity.

"What are you doing there, my poor woman?" inquired Dick; "have you lost your way?"

"No!"

"Waiting for the coach?"

"I have no money to ride," answered the emale.

"Hang the money!" exclaimed the kind-hearted man;

"jump up! I wouldn't leave a dog on the road such day as this—much more a human being! So jump up, say, and welcome!"

"I am going with my child towards Colchester," replied the forlorn creature, for the first time looking up "every hope I have in the world depends on my reaching it! But I thank you for your kindness," she added, gratefully, "although I cannot profit by it!"

If Dick, who had seen much of the world, had been struck by the language and manner of the speaker, he was still more so by her countenance. Although her delicate features were sharp and pinched by want, sufficient traces remained, amid the wreck of suffering and passion, to tell how beautiful she once had been: her long hair, black as the wing of night, had escaped from the shawl drawn over her head to protect her against the pelting rain, and fell upon the neck and shoulders of the wanderer, in thick, limpy, half-curved masses, resembling clusters of torpid snakes; her face was pale as the impress of death's seal; but the eyes—the large, lustrous eyes—relieved its ghastly, corpse-like hue. There was a tale of misery and suffering in their eloquent expression.

It was a countenance which, once seen, would haunt us like a dream—pursue us through the blanket of the night in after years—and never be forgotten.

Carefully sheltered beneath the folds of her shawl was a female infant, about four years old. There was no mistaking the parentage of the child, so closely did it resemble its mother, who held it nestled to her aching breast, in the hope of imparting the warmth she had ceased to feel herself.

"You will never be able to reach Colchester to-night!" observed the coachman, at the same time dismounting from the box; "but I'll tell you what you can do! About a mile from hence is a lone house upon the heath, known by the name of the Travellers' Rest. It is a decent place enough—and, although the landlord does not bear the best of characters, his wife is a good-hearted, kind creature, who will take care of you. Every one speaks well of Mabel."

"Mabel," repeated the woman, "who formerly lived in the family of Lady Briancourt?"

"The very same," replied Dick; "she left the hall five years since—no one knew why or wherefore—turned away for some slight fault, I suppose—and shortly afterwards married a dissipated fellow, named Ned Cantor."

"Did she marry him?" exclaimed the female, in a tone of painful surprise; "she merited a better fate! He is a bad—bad man!"

"You know him?"

"No—but I have heard of him!"

The outside passengers began to grow impatient, and a white handkerchief was seen rubbing the steam from the window on the inside of the coach; shortly afterwards, a pair of sharp, grey, ferret-like eyes appeared, peering through the glass.

"I must be off!" said Dick; "but first let me see your child."

The wanderer drew aside her shawl to disclose the features of her infant, which looked up piteously into the pale face of its mother, and faintly smiled.

"Poor little thing!" said the kind-hearted man, placing a crown piece in the little outstretched hand; "there—no words—I hate 'em! Good bye! Make the best of your way to the Travellers' Rest, and if Ned Cantor makes any difficulty in admitting you, tell him Dick Gurney sent you."

Whistling to avoid hearing her thanks, the speaker remounted his seat.

"Pretty time you have wasted!" testily observed a stout, comfortable-looking person who was riding on the box; "where's her parish?"

"A wide one, sir—the world."

"Humph! You had better have left her there, then!" was the churlish reply.

"I'll thank you, sir," said the coachman, "for that rug!" pointing to one he had lent the passenger to throw over his shoulders; "can't spare it any longer."

"Nonsense, Dick—I shall get wet through!"

"Can't help it, sir—so will that poor creature!"

"Why you don't mean to give it to her?" exclaimed the gentleman, in a tone of indignant surprise.

"Indeed but I do!" answered the coachman, firmly.

"Of course you can take it!" said the passenger, slowly pulling it off; "I had some thoughts of giving her sixpence, but now —"

"You have thought better of it!" interrupted Dick, finishing the sentence for him; "here my good woman," he added, throwing down the rug—a large and thick one—to the wanderer; "wrap your child in that, and take care of yourself."

Crack went the whip, and off started the horses at a brisk pace—for they had got chilled in the rain by the delay; their benevolent driver not waiting even for an instant to receive the thanks which the object of his bounty faintly murmured forth.

When the coach drew up at the post-house to change horses, one of the inside passengers—the gentleman with the grey, ferret-like eyes—got out, and, to Dick's surprise, informed him that he should proceed no further.

"Why you are booked to London, sir?"

"I know it, my friend—paid one pound six for my place—not likely to forget it! The fact is, I have forgotten some deeds and papers of importance—left them at the house of a client of mine—I must return directly."

"Nothing sooner than the mail!" observed the landlord of the posting-house, who had drawn near, whilst the luggage of the speaker was being removed. "Excellent accommodations—this way, sir!"

"Anything more, sir?" inquired Dick, pointing to the packages—which consisted of a carpet-bag, dressing-case, and a tolerably large portmanteau.

"Nothing!" said the gentleman; "thank you—all right! Take them in, waiter! By-the-bye," he added, "what were you saying to that beggar-woman on the heath, just now?"

"She was no beggar, sir—but a poor creature on her way to see some friends in Colchester. I directed her to a house where she could obtain shelter till the morning—that was all."

"To Ned Cantor's?"

"Yes—do you know him?"

"No," replied the possessor of the remarkable grey, ferret-like eyes; "but I heard you name him. It was very kind of you! Poor wretch—I really felt for her!"

"Did you," said Dick; "where?"

"Where?" repeated the gentleman, "why in my heart, to be sure!"

"Ah, I thought it wasn't in your pocket!" drily observed the coachman, "or I should have noticed it!"

And away stumped the speaker on his wooden pin—for Dick Gurney some years previously had lost his leg, from the upsetting of his coach by a flock of sheep. Betag a man of some property and independent spirit, he did not wait to receive the usual half-crown, which the passenger was reluctantly drawing from his well-filled purse.

The character of the benevolent coachman is not an imaginary one. Many a time, when a boy, have we ridden on the box with him, and witnessed acts of his charity as kind and eccentric as the one we have described.

No sooner had the Norwich Times driven off, than the passenger informed the landlord that he should require a messenger to ride a few miles for him over the common.

"Let me see," said the host, deliberating with himself; "who can I send?"

"It must be some one you can rely upon."

"Of course, sir!" replied the man; "is it far you want to send him?"

"About eight miles. He will have two notes to deliver: one to Sir Charles Briancourt—the other to a tenant of his—a fellow named Ned Cantor—who lives somewhere upon the heath: I will write them directly. Meanwhile, order me some dinner—the best you have in the house."

"Certainly," answered the landlord, with an air of alacrity; "Bandy-legged Jem shall take the brown mare, and be ready in five minutes."

"That will do!"

Lawyer Quirk—the name of the passenger—seated himself in the coffee-room, and wrote the two notes. The first he carefully sealed with his family crest—a snake in the grass, with the motto "Cave" beneath it—it was addressed to his client, the baronet; the second he merely wafered. Just as he had finished, the messenger entered. He was a thin, short, sharp, vixen-faced looking old man, with iron-grey hair, combed smooth as a terrier's coat over his forehead. His eyes were quick and piercing, but furtive in their expression—for you no sooner caught their glance than they avoided you. His legs—from having passed at an early age the greater portion of his days in the saddle—were bowed like a parenthesis. Hence the soubriquet by which the landlord had designated him, and by which he was generally known for miles round the country. Jem's walk, in consequence of his deformity, was slow and ungainly. Perhaps the consciousness of it gave him an awkward, heavy air; but once on horseback, he was a different being—all life and animation. He was not only acknowledged to be the best, but the most fearless rider in the county.

"Who are you?" inquired the lawyer, raising his head from the table.

"Jem!" was the short and not over civil reply.

"Generally called 'Bandy-legged Jem,' I believe?"

"Yes, by fools!"

"Hem!" said Mr. Quirk, not over pleased with the retort; "now, Jem, here are two notes for you. I suppose you can read?"

"I suppose I can!"

"Of course so much intelligence could never have been acquired without the art of reading—unnecessary to ask the question!" added the lawyer; "merely a habit of mine. Do you know Ned Cantor?"

"I know no good of him!" answered the post-boy.

"No matter, Jem—it is not necessary that you should know any good of him. All I require for you to know is his place of abode—his domicile."

"I know that."

"Ride there, then," continued Mr. Quirk, "as fast as you can—deliver him that note—the one with the wafer—then cut across the heath to the hall, and ask to see Sir Charles Briancourt."

"He will be at dinner."

"No matter for that; tell the butler that you come from me, and he will at once admit you."

"How am I to tell him your name," demanded the messenger, "unless you first tell it to me?"

"No matter," said the man of law, who had private reasons for not wishing to be known; "you can describe me."

"Oh, yes!" answered Bandy-legged Jem, with a satirical grin; "I can describe you! Iron-grey, rising sixteen hands, slightly spavined, no quidder, but devilishly inclined to shy—sire, a broken-down hunter, turned out of a good stable—dam, a roan filly, rest of the pedigree unknown."

While the post-boy was thus describing the appearance of the lawyer, the latter secretly winced and withered—for he felt assured that the satirical old man knew him, and had taken the occasion to avenge himself upon him for the observation he had made about his legs.

"Yes, yes," he muttered, somewhat confusedly, "that will do—they cannot fail to recognise me!"

"I should think not!" replied Jem; "the picture is as like you as if it had been put in the Hue and Cry."

"Away with you!" exclaimed Mr. Quirk, looking very red in the face—for his name in early life had appeared in the respectable publication alluded to, although he deemed the circumstance forgotten; "and when you return, I'll give you a sovereign! But, hark ye, no more portrait-painting," he added, with an uneasy look, "if you please! I have no wish to sit a second time for my likeness!"

"Just as your honour pleases," observed Jem, whose anger was considerably mollified by the promise of the sovereign. "I'll soon be back!"

The next instant he rattled past the windows of the room in which the conversation had taken place, mounted on the brown mare.

"Hem!" muttered the gentleman, looking after him; "that fellow knows more than I suspected; but I have no time to think of him, when the web I have been weaving in solitude and patience for years, is threatened to be swept away! How fortunate that I met her! How changed she is!" he added; "all but the eyes of hate had failed to recognise her. She can't live long: once in the grave, the rest is clear and easy!"

With this Christian-like reflection, Mr. Quirk drew his chair towards the fire, and rang the bell for dinner. He was one of those heartless beings who could have eaten it had it been spread upon his mother's coffin-lid. And yet all the world spoke well of Lawyer Quirk: his voice was so very soft, and his manners—he often used to boast that his manners had been a fortune to him.

CHAPTER II.

I talk to stone—I'll talk to it no more.—SHERIDAN KNOWLES.

THE little public-house on Lexden Heath, known by the name of the Travellers' Rest, was one of those humble places of accommodation which decent poverty selects. It was frequented chiefly by pedlars and packmen, now almost an extinct race, since the rail has brought the goods of Manchester and Sheffield to every village door. As we before stated, it was kept by a man named Ned Cantor, formerly a gardener in the family of Lady Briancourt, who, by dint of perseverance, to say nothing of his good looks, had persuaded the pretty Mabel, her ladyship's own maid, to take him for better or worse—but not till she had lost her situation. Many had been the speculations upon the subject, but none knew the cause of her dismissal: from the day of her leaving, her mistress was never heard to mention her name or inquire after her fate.

Ned was a tall, rakish, good-looking fellow, with long, black, curly hair and dark eyes—it was generally supposed there was a half-cast of the gipsy in him. Although capable of great exertion, he detested work—a day or night passed in the woods, poaching or ferreting the rabbits on the common, fatigued him less than an hour's regular labour; although he had been brought up as a gardener, he took no delight in flowers: the little patch of land round his cottage, which, properly cultivated, would have supplied him and his family with vegetables throughout the year, appeared little less desolate than the rest of the heath from which it had been reclaimed.

Mabel—a fair-haired, blue-eyed girl, the very type of patience—on the contrary, was as industrious as her husband was idle and dissolute. Although she had no one to assist her, the house was remarkable for the extreme neatness and propriety with which it was kept: the brick floors were daily scrubbed and the furniture dusted—much to the annoyance of her husband, who disliked so much splashing and washing. Like most lazy people, he had an antipathy to water.

Mabel was seated by the fire, patiently plying her needle. From time to time she would raise her eyes to watch the gambols of her child—a sparkling, gipsy-like little fairy—who had inherited not only the flashing eyes and dark hair of its father, but much of his wayward, passionate disposition.

If Ned loved anything on earth, it was this child; he idolised and spoilt her. Whenever Mabel scolded her for any little act of mischief, the father would take her upon his knee, smother her with kisses, and bid her do it again if she liked, and pay no attention to her mother. But the child, despite his lessons, did pay attention; and would often watch the first opportunity of sliding from his knees, and, creeping to the side of Mabel, kiss away her tears, and whisper:

"Don't cry! Meg good girl now!"

Although so young, the infant appeared to comprehend that the love of her father was a selfish love; for, despite his indulgence, she evidently preferred her mother. Ned was proud of her beauty—she amused him. Often would he observe to his wife, as he stroked the long, silken curls of the child, that she would one day give some fine young fellow the heartache; and conclude by expressing a hope that she might play her cards well.

Mabel, when she heard him, involuntarily used to shudder, although she was far from divining what he meant.

"What a fearful day!" thought the mistress of the Travellers' Rest, looking through the narrow casement; "at all events we shall have no guests to-night, to disturb us with their drinking and riotous debauch. Would to heaven Ned had chosen any other way of living!"

There was a faint knocking at the door of the cottage.

"Come in!" said Mabel, in no very amiable tone; for she supposed it to be one of the usual frequenters of the house whose absence she had rejoiced in.

The door opened, and the wanderer, drenched to the skin, notwithstanding the protection of the rug which Dick Gurney had thrown her—walked, or rather staggered, into the room.

Despite her poverty-stricken appearance, the kind-hearted woman rose, and placed her in a chair near the fire.

The stranger threw aside her shawl and hood. For a few moments the two females sat and regarded each other in silence. The poor wanderer was the first to speak.

"Mabel, have you, too, forgotten me?"

At the sound of her voice, a sudden light, a flood of recollection, broke upon the hostess of the Travellers' Rest. She started from her seat, threw her arms round the speaker, clasped her with passionate fondness to her bosom, crying and sobbing like a child. The woman permitted rather than received her caresses with the utmost impassibility.

"My dear young lady! my sweet, kind, good mistress! you in such a state! You, whom I have seen the idol of your father's house—followed, worshipped by every one!"

"Even so!" said the outcast, calmly; "indebted for the rags that cover me to charity! There are those in the escutcheon vault at St. Botolph's that would burst in indignation from their cements, could they behold me."

"They would—they would!" sobbed Mabel.

Little Meg, awed by the appearance of the stranger, and terrified at the grief of her mother, began to cry and cling to her.

"Is that your child?" inquired the stranger.

"It is!" replied the hostess.

"And are you happy?"

"Happy!" repeated the woman, with a burst of feeling. "I have never been happy since you left! Ned does not ill-use me, as yet; but he is not the husband I expected to find him. Your kindness and indulgence had spoiled me for a poor man's wife. I looked for a companion and friend—a guide and staff through life—instead of which I gave myself a master! All he required was a drudge to prepare his food and work for him—a sort of human house dog, to watch his home in his absence, and welcome him on his return; but no matter! You are drenched, weary, hungry, perhaps? Thank God I have still the power of serving you without Ned's knowing it!"

Mabel conducted her guest to the inner room, taking the children with them. As soon as she had changed their dripping garments for such clothes of her own and little Meg's which she thought her husband would not recognise, she desired her own child to leave the room.

"I won't!" answered the infant, saucily; "and I'll tell father!"

"What will you tell him?"

"That you have given the woman with the big eyes that pretty gown—and then he'll beat you!"

The mother coloured to the very temples. She would willingly have concealed the extent of her misery from her former mistress.

"I thought, Mabel," said the latter, reproachfully, "you told me Ned had not ill-used you yet? I can comprehend now all you have endured—coldness, unkindness, blows! Heaven help us!" she added; "we are both very wretched!"

"It is the first time," exclaimed the mother of little Meg, bursting into tears, "that I ever deceived you! Forgive me—pray forgive me!"

No sooner did the wayward child perceive the grief of its parent, than its ill-humour vanished in an instant. Springing into her lap—for Mabel had sunk upon a chair—she threw her little arms about her neck, and began kissing away her tears.

"Don't cry, mammy—don't cry! and Meg will be a good girl, and do as you bid her! Father shan't beat you!"

"Go!" said her mother, taking both the children by the hand, and leading them to the door; "go and play together!"

The stranger's child looked wistfully in the face of its parent.

"Go, my love!" she said.

And the two little creatures left the room.

The instant they were alone, Mabel barred the door, to prevent interruption, should her husband or any of the usual frequenters of the house suddenly arrive.

"Do you recollect it?" she said, pointing to a curiously carved, high-backed oaken chair, covered with faded tapestry.

"Ay," said the stranger, mournfully, "it stood formerly in my dressing-room at the hall. I have heard say that my grandmother worked it."

"When I married," resumed the mistress of the Travellers' Rest, "I brought it with me. If you remember rightly, the back is made to open: we discovered the secret when children. See if you can find the spring."

After some little effort, her former mistress succeeded. The chair, which was carved in massive oak, and as old, probably, as the reign of Elizabeth, had been contrived with a double back, which unfolded like the leaves of a book, on pressing the fingers in one of the interstices of the open-work.

No sooner had she touched the spring, than the outer division flew back, and a small green silk purse fell, with a clink, upon the floor.

"Take it!" said Mabel; "it is yours—your parting gift! Ned dreams not that I possess it! And even if he did, who has so good a right to it? I kept it from him," she added, with a sigh, "thinking one day to give him an agreeable surprise; or as a resource, should poverty and sickness overtake us."

"I shall not require it," observed the outcast, mournfully. "My days—nay, my very hours—are numbered; but this discovery has relieved my mind from a deep anxiety. Mabel, I intend to make one last attempt to soften the heart of my mother!"

"Of Lady Briancourt!" interrupted the woman, bitterly. "She has no heart! It is stone—stone!"

"Still it shall be tried! Whether I succeed or fail, I feel I have not long to live! To your care, therefore, I confide the only treasure I possess—the proofs of my marriage and the legitimacy of my child! Guard them," she added, seizing her by the arm, and fixing her dark eyes upon her, "as you would the life of your own offspring! Let no bribe—no temptation—induce you to give them up! They will be sought for far and wide, high and low, by my unnatural brother!"

"Not even Ned's ill-usage—poverty—starvation, my dear young mistress, shall wring the secret from me!" exclaimed Mabel, sinking on her knees, and confirming her promise by an oath. "Never will I resign them, but to those whom you appoint!"

"To George Stanley, if he lives," whispered the stranger, faintly. "If not, to my child, when she has a husband to protect her!"

The papers were carefully placed in the little recess, which was just large enough to contain them, and the chair restored to its usual appearance, when they were disturbed by a loud knocking at the door of the chamber.

"It is my husband!" whispered Mabel. "For heaven's sake take the purse, and pay for whatever you require! Alas!" she added, "that ever such a word should escape my lips to you!"

"Poor Mabel!" sighed her mistress. "I understand you!"

"Mistress Cantor! Mrs. Cantor!" exclaimed Bandy-legged Jem, who had just arrived, upon the brown mare; "is your husband at home?"

"No!" replied the hostess of the Travellers' Rest, opening the door of the inner chamber. "What do you want with him?"

"I don't want him," replied the snappish little old man; "but there is one at the post-house that does!"

"At the post-house! Who?"

"That's a secret!" said the post-boy, glancing at the same time significantly at the row of bright pewter mugs suspended against the wall. Mabel took the hint, and, filling one of the largest with her best ale, placed it before him.

"I said it was a secret," repeated Jem, after taking a hearty draught "but of course Ned has no secrets from you! It is Sir Charles's lawyer, Mr. Quirk! He thought I didn't know him!" added the speaker, with a chuckle; "but he was mistaken!"

At the name of Quirk, the two females exchanged glances. It was evident that the name of the lawyer had produced a painful impression upon them.

"Here is a note for Ned!" said the messenger, pointing to the one with the wafer. They were both lying, with the address downwards, upon the table.

"And the other," observed the wanderer, "is for Sir Charles Briancourt!"

Jem looked at her with surprise, as much as to ask how she could have guessed that.

"I see it all, Mabel!" whispered the unhappy lady. "Quirk has recognised me, and this letter is to put my brother on his guard, to prevent my obtaining access to the hall! I must accompany him!"

The inducement of a few shillings which the landlady offered, easily prevailed upon Jem to give the poor woman, as he called her, a "lift" to the great house.

"It's a bargain!" he said. "But make haste!"

Mabel brought her former mistress her own cloak and hood—which not only promised to afford her protection from the storm, but effectually concealed her features—and began to set out her humble table with the best food in the place.

"I cannot eat!" said the object of her care. "My heart is too full!"

"A glass of wine, then?"

The outcast raised it to her parched, thin lips—then set it down again, having barely moistened them.

"I'm a goin'!" exclaimed Jem. "Can't wait!"

"One moment—only one!" replied the unhappy woman, terribly excited. "I cannot part with my child without a kiss—a word—a blessing!"

Catching up the infant, who was playing on the hearth with little Meg, she pressed it passionately to her breast and imprinted a fond kiss—a mother's kiss—upon its cheek.

"Take it, Mabel," she said, "and guard it till my return—should I return! If not, God of the fatherless protect my child, and bless you, Mabel—bless you, as you keep your oath!"

The last words were uttered in a tone so low, that the post-boy could not hear them.

"Thee beest as light as a feather!" observed Jem, as he lifted the stranger on the rug which Mabel had assisted him to arrange by way of pillion behind the saddle. "Brown Bess will scarcely know that she is carrying double! Mind and give the note to Ned," he added, turning to the landlady, "the instant he returns!"

Poor Mabel's heart was too full to reply. She remained standing at her cottage-door till Brown Bess was no longer in sight; then returned to look after the infant, whom she found overcome with fatigue and hunger, upon the hearth—little Meg watching beside her.

"She says she is hungry, mother," said the child; "give her some bread. Is the woman with the big eyes gone away?"

"Yes."

"And will she come back?"

"I hope so."

"She shan't take the little girl, if she does!" exclaimed Meg, petulantly; "bad woman, to let her be hungry and give her no bread! I should hate you," she added, bitterly, "if you served me so!"

Despite her sorrow at the fate of her former mistress, and the embarrassment she would be in to account for the presence of a strange child, should Ned return before its mother came back to claim it, Mabel could not avoid feeling pleased at the sympathy which Meg expressed towards the little stranger.

"Her heart," she thought, "is all right, if evil counsels do not pervert it!" And then her thoughts involuntarily reverted to her husband.

Raising the sleeping infant in her arms, she gently woke it from its slumber, and then set it down to the table to eat. The eyes of the helpless creature sparkled at the unusual sight of food; but after the first mouthful it began to cry, and ask for its mother.

"She will soon be back."

"Marian will wait, then," said the child, "for mamma."

And, young as she was, she kept her resolution, although from time to time her eyes glanced longingly towards the food upon the table.

"Did you hear that, Meg?" said her mother, willing to inculcate a lesson; "would you wait for me?"

"Not if I was hungry," said her daughter, bluntly.

In about half an hour Ned returned. No sooner had he read the note, which Jem had brought, than he asked after the woman who had called.

"Gone," said his wife, with a look of marked surprise; "but how did —?"

"No matter. Is that her child?" he added, fixing his eyes upon the little stranger.

"It is Ned," replied Mabel; "for God's sake, do not harm it!"

"Harm it, you fool! what should I harm it for?" answered her husband, brutally. "No, no! Take care of it till I come back—it's worth its weight in gold!"

So saying, he left the house, and took his way across the heath.

CHAPTER III.

But thou, false guardian of a charge too good;
Thou mean deserter of thy brother's blood—
Cold are those lips which warned the world before,
And those love-darting eyes shall roll no more.

Pope.

THE Dowager Lady Briancourt was the only child and heiress of one of the most ancient as well as wealthy families in the county. Her father—a ox-hunting squire —who doated upon her, indulged her in every whim: the natural consequence of which, as might be expected, was that she became headstrong, proud, and capricious. At the age of eighteen her father informed her that he had contracted a marriage for her with his neighbour, Sir Charles Briancourt.

"Never, papa!" exclaimed the spoiled beauty; "he is old!"

"What has that to do with it?" demanded Squire Broadlands. "He is rich—his covers join mine—so say no more about it."

It was the first time the heiress had ever been contradicted, and it is impossible to say how far she might have carried her opposition to her hitherto indulgent parent, had not a circumstance occurred which rendered it a matter of indifference. This was nothing less than the marriage of Captain Stanley, on whom she had long placed her affections, and fondly imagined that they were returned. The day after the intelligence, the young lady sought her father in the library, and, with a pale countenance but a firm accent, announced her intention of accepting the husband he had proposed for her.

"Of course you will, Clara!" observed the old gentleman, who was just preparing to beat the home cover. "I knew you would! Bless me!" he added, "how pale you look! Kiss me! there, you silly puss—Sir Charles will make you a good husband. If he doesn't, I'll shoot him, and you will have all the family diamonds."

And Clara Broadlands had the diamonds—for within a month after the conversation we have narrated, she gave her hand to Sir Charles Briancourt; who, five years afterwards, obligingly left her a widow, with one son—the present baronet—and a daughter named Clara—the former mistress of Mabel—the outcast and wanderer of Lexden Heath.

Lady Briancourt—like all proud and passionate natures—was extremely fond of power. Her feelings towards her daughter received their first shock from the fact of her father bequeathing to his granddaughter the reversal of his estates. It was a fatal legacy—from that hour her brother hated her, and her surviving parent scarcely regarded her with a mother's love.

But indifference became hate when, at the age of eighteen, Clara Briancourt eloped with George Stanley, the son of her mother's former admirer, whose preference for another had so deeply wounded her pride and vanity. She not only forbade her presence, but returned her letters, supplicating forgiveness, unopened.

In the hope of bettering his fortune, young Stanley had been induced to accept a situation in one of our colonies. His wife, whom it was arranged he should send for, never heard of him from the day of his departure; neither could she discover the address of the friend who had so interested himself in his favour as to procure him the appointment.

Vainly did Clara struggle, in the little cottage in Devonshire to which she had retired, to maintain herself and child. She had a school first—that failed; next took in needlework—it was all in vain; a withering influence seemed to surround her—slander had been at work. Those who once spoke kindly, turned aside at her approach; the landlord seized upon her furniture for rent.

Without a shelter, and only a few shillings in her pocket, the heart-broken girl, who had been reared in the lap of luxury, started on foot for Essex, in the hope of melting the obdurate heart of her stern mother.

We have already described her arrival at Lexden, and the meeting between her and her former attendant, Mabel, whose dismissal from the family of Lady Briancourt had been occasioned by the assistance she had rendered her young lady at the period of her elopement with the son of the man whose memory her ladyship hated.

The baronet and his mother were seated in the magnificently-furnished drawing-room of the old family mansion. The shutters were closed, and the velvet curtains carefully drawn, so as to exclude the least breath of air.

The person of the dowager was tall and stately—retaining, even at the advanced age of fifty-three, considerable remains of personal beauty. Although richly attired, and surrounded by all that wealth could give, the expression of her countenance would have convinced the discriminating physiognomist that she was anything but happy. She was cold and reserved in her manner, like one continually on guard against herself. Her household, which was numerous, obeyed her least look; but there were few—very few—who either loved or esteemed her.

Her son resembled his father. He possessed a good, gentlemanly figure, but a face devoid of all expression. He was devoted in his attentions to his mother, who, in addition to her own paternal estate, had a very considerable jointure upon that of her late husband; hence the baronet was anything but rich.

Often would Lady Briancourt, when alone—in allusion to her offending child—murmur to herself:

"Had she chosen any other than the son of him who won my affections and then slighted them, I could have forgiven her; but never shall his grandchild inherit the broad lands of my forefathers!"

Even at the moment she made the declaration, a secret monitor whispered to the haughty woman that "never" was a long word.

"Charles," said her ladyship, addressing the baronet, "I have been thinking that this is but a dull life for one of your age!"

"I do not feel so!" answered the sycophant, pressing her hand respectfully to his lips. "I am never dull where you are!"

"I often wonder you never felt disposed to marry!"

Sir Charles winced, like one who feels that he is about treading upon treacherous ground.

"There are the Howards, for instance," continued the lady. "Fine girls!"

"Too fine for me!" replied her son. "Besides, there is another reason!"

"What is it?"

"Their mother was related to one who, I have heard, offended you deeply!"

Lady Briancourt coloured through her rouge, so sensitive was she still at any allusion to the Stanleys.

Fortunately, at this moment the butler entered the room.

"Well, Harrison," said the baronet, with a look of surprise, "I did not ring!"

"I am aware of it, Sir Charles!" said the servant; "but there is a person below, with a letter for you!"

"Let him send it up!"

"He refuses, Sir Charles!"

"Bid him take it away, then!"

"That he equally declines doing! He says that he has ridden over from the post-house with it; and from what I can gather, it is from Mr. Quirk, who has met with some accident! I thought it best, therefore —"

"You are right, Harrison—quite right!" said his master. "Show the fellow into the breakfast-room! I'll see him instantly!"

So saying, he followed the butler out of the room.

Although Lady Briancourt did not choose to express it, she felt equally anxious with her son to know what could possibly have happened to Mr. Quirk, who was no less deep in her confidence than the baronet's.

"What can have occurred?" she mentally thought; "has the wretched young man returned?"

A tremulous hand was heard upon the handle of the drawing-room door.

"Who is there?" demanded the dowager, angrily. She knew it could not be Sir Charles, and she had a great objection to being intruded on.

The door opened, and a spectre, such as had sometimes haunted the unnatural parent in her dreams, entered the room. It was her daughter Clara; her face so pale and thin, there was no mistaking death's impress. Clapping her hands, she advanced, uttered the name of "mother!" and sank at her feet.

"Well!" said the haughty woman, steeling her heart against her, "what would you—gold? You know the conditions on which I will supply you!"

"I am dying!" said the poor girl.

"And you come to ask my forgiveness?" interrupted her ladyship; "there is only one price at which you can obtain it!"

"I know—I know! the inheritance of my child!" murmured the dying Clara; "but no! you cannot ask it! Your heart is human, though your speech is cold and harsh! If I have been disobedient, am I not punished? I have been driven from my home, reduced to eat the bitter bread of charity; I have braved the night-wind and the storm, that I might hear you whisper sweet words of pardon ere I die! Mother," she added, "I am dying at your feet for want—for food: will you not pardon me?"

Lady Briancourt trembled violently. Hard as she was, there was something in her child expiring in her presence for want which shocked even her iron nature, when her son hastily entered the room, followed by two of the servants.

"Take that woman away!" he said, pointing to the prostrate form of his sister. "How dare you let Lady Briancourt be thus intruded on?"

Clara clung frantically to the folds of her mother's velvet robe.

"No—no!" she shrieked; "not till she has forgiven me!"

"Charles," said her ladyship, "take her away; but let her not be harshly used!"

"Mother—mother!"

"She is mad!" exclaimed the baronet, not wishing the domestics to suspect the nearness of the tie between them.

"Remove her at once!"

No sooner had the hands of the menials touched the person of the unhappy outcast, than she started to her feet, and, with a gesture of great dignity, waved them from her.

"Back!" she said; "I shall be carried hence, but not by such hands as yours! The escutcheoned pall will cover my remains, and the plume be borne before me! How the fiends will laugh, and angels weep, to see those who starved the heiress of Broadlands—hunted her to the grave—mourn—ah! ah! mourn for her—and follow her to the grave! Back!" she repeated; "I claim the right to die beneath my father's roof!"

"Charles!" whispered the horror-stricken Lady Briancourt, "she is dying—send for assistance!"

"Too late, madam—too late!" said the baronet.

"Ay, too late!" repeated the dying girl, whose reason began to wander. "Ye cannot save your victim, if ye would! Too late! But I forgive you," she added; "mother, I forgive you, if you will only let me lay my head upon your bosom, and breathe my last sigh there!"

The servants looked at each other, and drew back: from the agitation of their mistress, they felt convinced that the wretched woman who had obtained access to her presence was no impostor—but the young and once beautiful girl, whose name, despite her ladyship's prohibition, was still whispered with regret by the old domestics of the family.

"Leave the room!" said Sir Charles. Addressing his mother, he added, as soon as the domestics were gone, "shall I remove her to my chamber?"

Taking her silence for assent, he clasped his sister by the waist, and attempted to carry her from the drawing-room. The dying girl shrieked and struggled so violently, that in the effort she burst a blood-vessel; and in an instant the unnatural brother was deluged with the crimson stream.

Lady Briancourt fainted.

"On you," said Clara—"on you and on your race! The inheritance you have sinned for shall escape your grasp! My image haunt you! My child—my poor, motherless girl!" she exclaimed, with a burst of feeling, "who will protect her?"

"God will protect her!" she added, after a pause.

"Hear it, Charles, and tremble! To Him I leave her!"

With these words, the outcast, whose last thoughts were of her child, sank upon the richly-carpeted floor, and expired at the feet of her stern and cruel parent.

Despite his habitual self-possession, the baronet was bewildered by the sudden death of his sister. It would be impossible, he felt, to hush up the affair. An inquest, in all probability, would be held, and much transpire which it was his interest should be buried in oblivion. His first care was to see Lady Briancourt conveyed to her apartment; the next, to send for Quirk.

Jem was started off upon Brown Bess, with strict orders to return with the lawyer. On his way, he called at the Travellers' Rest, to inform Mabel of what had happened.

"Only to think!" he added. "The poor young lady dead!—starved, I heard one of the servants say, by her own mother, and Sir Charles, the baronet!"

Poor Mabel! Her heart beat wildly at the intelligence; and, without considering the folly of such a step, she started off on foot towards the hall. When she arrived there, the servants would have refused her admittance; but she broke through them, and made good her entrance to the drawing-room, where she found Sir Charles directing the servants to remove the body to some outhouse—for it was that of an impostor.

"She was no impostor!" exclaimed Mabel, resolutely; "but your sister, and, after the death of her cruel mother, by her grandfather's will, the heiress of Broadlands. You have murdered her between you," she added; "but God, in His own good time, will avenge her!"

There was no disputing the testimony of one who from girlhood had been the favourite attendant of Clara Briancourt. Muttering a curse for her officiousness, Sir Charles retired, and the faithful Mabel remained to perform the last office of affection towards the dead.

During her absence from the Travellers' Rest, not only the child of Clara disappeared, but her own. Ned's rage and grief were so real or so well affected, that they disarmed even his wife's suspicions; for, whatever his feeling might have been towards the offspring of the outcast, he could have no interest in harming little Meg. Whether he really had a share in the abduction of the infants, time, perchance, will show.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE LOADSTONE MOUNTAIN AT SANTO DOMINGO.

How tenaciously cling to memory the tales which in our childish years made the literature of the nursery! Neither the earnest duties of life, nor its events of grief or of joy, efface the images which these have left. Thus, I remember yet the impression made on my childish mind by the tale of the "Loadstone Mountain."

"It rose," said the nurse, "bold and solitary from the ocean's bosom; and every vessel that came within its baneful influence was irresistibly drawn by an unseen power towards its shores, lashed by the raging sea. When the doomed bark had come within a certain distance, so great was the magnetic attraction, that every iron bolt and nail which held her together, in those days when naval architecture was unacquainted with copper and copper-fastened vessels, flew from its hold—the planks broke asunder—down came the masts—and, with a hideous crash, the fate of the ship and her inmates was fulfilled!"

The nursery-tale arose fresh to my memory when, during my journeyings in the Dominican territory, I heard of a remarkable hill of magnetic iron ore: not standing in the sea, but on the banks of the Yuna—a river flowing peacefully enough during the dry season along its western foot, but a fearful and wide-spreading torrent during the tropical winter. My curiosity was excited, and I resolved to visit and examine the mountain.

An opportunity for putting my resolve in execution offered itself last May. I left Bonao—where, at the discovery, a powerful Cacique of that name resided, and where Columbus, as early as 1494, established a town—with my companion, on the 15th of that month. The morning was cloudy and oppressive: not a breath of air moved the feathery leaves of the numerous palms which adorned the valley. We reached in safety Piedra Blanca, a solitary hut lying at the foot of the hill on the left bank of the River Maymon.

Naturally, this hill with magnetic iron was to me of the greatest interest. It rose above the savana to a height of about 600 feet, crowned at the summit with a majestic palm-tree, of the species called Palma Real. The hill extends from north to south about 600 feet, and is bathed on its western foot by the River Yuna. Its northern part is covered with rugged black rocks, of all sizes, from that of a pigeon's egg to masses a ton in weight—every one of which, great or small, is more or less magnetic.

I ascertained, in the first instance, the true north point upon the adjacent savana, far from all influence of the magnetic ironstone, and marked it by stakes. I then ascended the Loadstone Hill with our host. The blocks, as already observed, are of different sizes; some are very black in appearance, with metallic lustre—others are more or less coloured red by oxidation. A magnifying-glass shows that the forms of the crystals are those of the octohedron—others are rhomboid.

The influence which these rocks exercise upon the needle is scarcely credible. I used for my observations one of Cary's prismatic, and one of Troughton and Simms's pocket compasses. The needles were placed in violent gyrations when approaching the ground. In some instances, they whirled round with great rapidity before ultimately settling with the north point to the south. When placed on other blocks, the motion was less rapid; but the poles were invariably reversed. Raising the compasses gradually above the rocks, the magnetic influence lessened; and when from three to four feet above the rocks, it ceased altogether. Nevertheless, I found that the deviation was not fixed. Cary's compass differed from $1\frac{1}{2}$ degrees to 4 degrees east from the true north point.

The ore attracts, with the greatest ease, sewing-needles; and a piece which I possess, only two inches in size, and five inches in its largest circumference, weighing 2294 grains (apothecaries' weight), raises up a small key of iron, weighing 32 grains.

The German mineralogist, G. A. Netto, as Senor Vazquez informed me, dug for about six feet into the ground, where he found that the quantity of the magnetic iron ore diminished. I am inclined, therefore, to think that they are erratic or travelled fragments. A trace of the ore occurs again near Cotuy, traversing the high road; but the blocks have much less magnetic power than at the Hatillo.

With regard to its value, I will observe that Netto considered the ore equal to the best iron ore of Danamora, in Sweden, and Arendahl, in Norway. If it be considered that the Yuna waters the foot of the hill, and that the surrounding heights are clothed with pine-wood, what advantages would accrue to the persons who should work this mine! Here, tropical lassitude has tied the arms of Industry.

The southern part of the hill consists of mountain limestone—the direction of which appears to be S. 39 degrees E. Where this rock lies exposed to the influence of the atmosphere, it is much worn—having numerous cavities on the surface, smooth, as if drilled; and in other instances it is perfectly contorted—so that such a piece broken off might be taken, when not seen in contact with the other rocks, for a stunted piece of root from some old tree in the primeval forest.

At a short distance from this hill is another, with white marble. There is likewise veined jasper in the neighbourhood.

THE FISHERMAN'S CHILDREN

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

SLOWLY the melancholy day,

In cloud and storm passed o'er;

Fearful and wild the tall ships lay,

Off the rude Northumbrian shore;

'Mid the thunder's crash—and the lightning's ray

And the dashing ocean's roar!

And many a father's heart beat high,

With an aching fear of woe:

As he gazed upon the ghastly sky,

And heard the tempest blow!

Or watched with sad and anxious eye,

The warring waves below!

Oh! many a mournful mother wept;

And closer, fonder prest

The babe, that soft and sweetly slept

Upon her troubled breast!

While every hour that lingering crept,

Her agonies confest!

And one upon her couch was laid,

In deep and helpless pain;

Two children sought her side, and played,

And strove to cheer—in vain:

Till breathlessly, and half afraid,

They listened to the rain!

"'Tis a rough sea your father braves!"

The afflicted mother said;

"Pray that the Holy arm that saves,

May guard his precious head!

May shield him from the wrecking waves,

To aid ye,—when I'm dead!"

Then low the children bended there,

With clasped hands, to implore

That God would save them from despair,

And their loved sire restore:

And the heavens heard that quiet prayer,

'Mid all the tempest's roar!

'Twas eve!—and cloudlessly at last,

The sky in beauty gleamed;

O'er snowy sail and lofty mast

The painted pennon streamed;

The danger and the gloom had past,

Like horrors—only dreamed!

Swift to the desolated beach

The Fisher's children bled;

But far as human sight could reach,

No boat swept o'er the tide!

Still on they watched—and with sweet speech

To banish grief they tried!

Long, long they sat—when, lo! a light

And distant speck was seen,—

Small as the smallest star of night,

When night is most serene!—

But to the Fisher's boy that sight

A sight of bliss had been!

"It comes!" he cried, "our father's boat

See—sister—by yon stone!

Not there—not there—still more remote—

I know the sail's our own!

Look!—look again!—they nearer float!

Thanks!—thanks to God alone!"

[THE TWO CHILDREN FROM CENTRAL AMERICA.]

THE AZTECS OF CENTRAL AMERICA.

ANY contribution to the history of the human race must always be welcomed with a feeling deeper than cordiality; for, with all our manifold attainments, we are still groping blindly in the dark as respects ourselves, our origin, our mission, and probable destiny. The science of geology, now received by the divines of all classes, having utterly destroyed the Jewish chronology in its physical aspect, every addition to our knowledge of the past—or rather that multitudinous assemblage of antecedents in our career which constitute the experience of the world—cannot but be received with eagerness, and, we should trust, grave anxiety. Knowledge of the past assists us in forming opinions as to the complexion of the future. Indeed, practically, without the accumulations of the past, we should be mere creatures of instinct—totally destitute of that sentient power which so remarkably distinguishes us from the brute creation. Therefore every addition to our knowledge of the past is a great gain: it is an invaluable jewel rescued from the gloom of a cave, the entrance to which had been blocked up for ages. But of all the acquisitions that throw any light on the history of the world, those in ethnology are the most interesting. The discovery of another variety of our species is of greater importance than the interpretation of Hindoo, Egyptian, or Assyrian hieroglyphics; for it presents to us a book which physiology can faithfully translate, and at the same time affords room for the speculations of more theoretic philosophy. The latest discovery of this kind—or rather alleged discovery—for it has not yet been cast into the furnace of rigid criticism—is one that created quite a sensation both in this country and the United States of America. It consists of the startling statement, that a city hitherto unknown to the rest of the world has been discovered in Central America, and that an enterprising traveller managed to escape from it, and carry along with him two children, as specimens of its inhabitants. These children are now being exhibited in the metropolis, and we subjoin the account of their discovery, as furnished by the exhibitors:

In 1843, Mr. Huertis, of Baltimore, and Mr. Hammond, of Canada, attempted to explore Central America. They had read Stevens's account, in his "Central America," of a conversation between himself and a priest residing at Santa Cruz del Quiche, relative to an unexplored city on the other side of the Great Sierra range, the glittering domes and minarets of which the priest averred having seen from the summit of the Sierra. The people, manners, and customs of this city were supposed to be precisely the same as in the days of Montezuma. Messrs. Huertis and Hammond arrived at Belize in the autumn of 1843, and, turning south-west, arrived at Coban on Christmas Day. They were there joined by Pedro Velasquez, of San Salvador, a Spaniard. From Coban they proceeded in search of the mysterious city. From Velasquez alone is any account of their travels to be obtained. Huertis and Hammond have never returned to tell their tale. According to the statement of Velasquez, on the 19th of May they reached the summit of the Sierra, at an altitude of 9500 feet, in lat. 15 deg. 48 min. N., and beheld in the distance the domes and minarets of a large city, apparently of the Egyptian character, and about 25 leagues from Ocoingo, in the same latitude, and in the direct course of the river Lugoartos. This city they eventually reached. Velasquez describes it to be of vast proportions, with heavy battlements, full of temples, gigantic statues, and pagan paraphernalia; the people having Peruvian manners combined with Assyrian magnificence, and bound to remain within the walls, seeking no intercourse with the world around. The name of the city is Iximaya. The travellers were informed that white men had previously entered it, but that no white man had ever returned. Hammond and Huertis were both slain—the former on entering the city, the latter in endeavouring to make his escape.

Velasquez being more wary, lulled his captors into security, and not only escaped himself, but brought with him two children belonging to the priests—the two now in England.

They are under the care of Professor Anderson, the well-known "Great Wizard of the North;" and he has arrived at the conclusion that the boy is seventeen years of age, and the girl eleven. Our illustration conveys an excellent idea of their singular physique; but we may add, in explanation, that the boy is three feet in stature, the girl twenty-six inches. Although so diminutive, neither of them is in the slightest manner deformed. Their bodily development, although so unique, is perfect—so that their claim to be classed among the genus homo is unquestionable.

The boy is the type of the pair. His forehead is retreating; and this, with the size of his nose, which is a strongly-marked acquiline, gives the face a bird-like appearance. The upper jaw projects, while the lower jaw recedes: so that when the mouth is closed, the under teeth do not touch the upper, but approach the middle of the palate. The countenance produced by this strange combination of features is at the first glance idiotic; but the impression of idiocy is soon removed by the bright intelligence which sparkles in the large eyes, and by a restless curiosity, which is visible in every gesture of the little creatures. The hair is black and glossy, and falls in small ringlets. The girl has the same characteristics, less strongly marked, and her aspect is more Jewish than that of her companion.

Of their educational accomplishments, as might be expected, very little can be said; but they have each evinced an aptitude for drawing, and are by no means indifferent to the charms of music.

And now for a few words as to their origin, rendered very remarkable by an historical theory which is connected with them. They are said to be descendants of the aborigines of Mexico—the Aztecs; and the region whence they are brought is said to have been the place of refuge chosen by the Aztecs when driven from Mexico by the conquering sword of Cortes; and it is supposed that they are among the last-surviving relics of that ill-starred race, with whom we have recently been made familiar by the researches of Mr. Prescott and Mr. Stevens, both Americans.

This suggestion, as we shall presently show, has no foundation in fact. The children bear the strongest resemblance to sculptured figures, which are unquestionably not of Aztec, but of more ancient origin; and on one occasion, when an ancient Mexican idol was brought to them, they recognised it, and embraced it at once. It seems, that while they were at New York, this idol was accidentally broken, and that the boy burst into an agony of grief at the calamity. The smallness of the children's stature is accounted for by a well-known cause of degeneracy—namely, a prohibition against marriage with strangers, or members of an inferior caste. It is to the sacerdotal caste, which would rank like that of the Brahmins in India, that the children are assigned; and so rare have the individuals of this race become, that it is said they have been advanced from the position of priests to that of gods—no very difficult advance under a system of theocracy. The fact that when the children sit down, they fall into a posture which is general among Mexican idols, and which would be extremely difficult if it were not the result of early training, is in favour of the supposition that they belong to some aboriginal race of Central America. The exhibitors assert that they are Aztecs. Now, to satisfactorily meet such a question, we must ask—Who are the Aztecs? They are a portion of that Indian population of Mexico which, when the Republic was in a comparatively flourishing condition, was estimated at two millions and a half: so that it is all nonsense to talk about these poor children being the last of their race. The copper-coloured Indians of the pure race, when Humboldt visited Mexico, actually formed two-fifths of the entire population; and as the subject introduced by this exhibition will most certainly be severely mystified by the savans devoted to ethnology, we think we ought to put our readers in possession of a few facts.

When the Spaniards conquered the country, they found few inhabitants in the region north of the parallel of 20 degrees. These provinces were occupied by two pastoral nations, whose hordes were scattered over an immense territory. From the seventh to the thirteenth century of our era, population seems in general to have continually flowed from north to south. The Toltecs first appeared in 648; the Chichimecs in 1170; the Nahuatlacs in 1178; and the Acolhuans and Aztecs in 1196. The Toltecs introduced the cultivation of maize and cotton. They built cities, made roads, and constructed those great pyramids which are among the most interesting remains in that country. They had a solar year, more perfect than that of the Greeks and Romans.

Of the appearance and characteristics of these various races, we must avail ourselves of the contributions to our knowledge on this subject of that great man and extraordinary traveller, Humboldt. He describes the Mexican Indians as bearing a general resemblance to those who inhabit Canada, Florida, Peru, and Brazil.

"They have the same swarthy and copper colour, flat and smooth hair, small beard, squat body, long eye, with the corner directed upwards towards the temple, prominent cheek-bones, thick lips, and an expression of gentleness in the mouth, strongly contrasted with a gloomy and severe look." There is, however, a considerable diversity of feature and physiological character among the different nations, which, though not detected by the hasty observation of the European stranger, is not less essential than the difference between the Circassian, the Moor, and the Persian. Thus, the Indians of Tlascala differ widely in their form from the Chichimecs of the northern provinces. It is remarkable that the natives of Mexico have a more swarthy complexion than the inhabitants of the warmer climates of South America. The Mexicans—particularly those of the Aztec and Otomite race—have more beard than any of the southern tribes, and almost all the Indians in the neighbourhood of the capital wear moustachios. To a great degree of muscular strength, the copper-coloured natives add the advantage of being rarely subject to any deformity. In Mexico they generally attain an advanced age, especially the women, who frequently reach a hundred years of age; and both the Mexican and the Peruvian Indians preserve their muscular strength to the last. Humboldt states, that their hair scarcely ever turns grey—that it is far more rare to find an Indian than a negro with grey hairs; but this is at variance with the testimony of Ulloa. He adds, that the Indians would undoubtedly attain a very great longevity, were it not for their excessive use of intoxicating liquors. In New Spain, drunkenness is most common among the Indians who inhabit the valley of Mexico and the environs of Puebla and Tlascala, wherever the mayaguey (or agave Americana) is cultivated on a large scale. The Mexican Indian is described by Humboldt as grave, melancholic, and silent, so long as he is not under the influence of intoxication. He loves to throw a mysterious air over the most indifferent actions. The more violent passions are seldom painted in his features; but there is something terrific in the change when he passes all at once from a state of absolute repose to violent and ungovernable agitation. The Peruvian Indian displays more gentleness of manners; the energy of the Mexican is apt to degenerate into ferocity. This is especially the case with the inhabitants of Tlascala, who are still distinguished by a certain haughtiness which seems to bespeak a remembrance of the independence of their ancestors. No race of men appear to be more destitute of imagination. There cannot, Humboldt says, exist a more marked contrast, than that which is presented by the impetuous vivacity of the Congo negro, and the apparent phlegm of the Indian. Yet, when the latter attains a certain degree of civilisation, "he displays a great facility of apprehension, a judicious mind, a natural logic, and a subtlety in seizing the finest differences in the comparison of objects." The Mexicans display a great aptitude in the arts of imitation, and a much greater skill in those which are purely mechanical. Humboldt was astonished at what they were able to execute in carving, with a bad knife, and on the hardest wood. They are fond of painting, but have been servilely imitating, for these three hundred years, the models which the Europeans imported with them at the conquest. Their music and dancing partake of the want of gaiety which characterises them. Their songs are terrific and melancholy. The Indian women show more vivacity than the men; but they take no share in the dance—their only business on such occasions being to present their lords with pulque, or other fermented liquors. The Mex' cas have preserved their fondness for flowers, which was noticed by Cortes. This taste, which indicates a relish for the beautiful, one is astonished to find in a people among whom a sanguinary worship, and the frequency of human sacrifices, might be thought to have extinguished all sensibility and kindly sentiment. In the great marketplace of Mexico, the Indian fruiterer appears seated behind an entrenchment of fresh herbs, and garlands of flowers and nosegays are suspended round his shop or stall, which are renewed every day. The European, says M. Humboldt, cannot fail to be struck with the care and elegance which the natives display in distributing the fruits, which they sell in small baskets of very light wood, ornamented with odoriferous flowers.

Upon the whole, the state of civilisation among the Mexican Indians may be considered as very nearly akin to that of the Chinese and Japanese, to whom, in many respects, they bear a resemblance. In the colour of the skin and hair, the defective beard, the high cheek-bones, and the direction of the eyes, they present the marks of an affinity to the Mongol race. "We cannot refuse to admit," continues the learned traveller, "that the human species does not contain races resembling one another more than the Americans, Mongols, Manchous, and Malays." There are, however, some essential peculiarities by which they are distinguished from each other. The cranium of the American differs materially from that of the Mongol, exhibiting a facial line more inclined, though straighter than that of the negro; and there is no race in which there is so slight a projection of the forehead. The cheek-bones are almost as prominent as in the Mongol, but not so sharply angular, and the under-jaw is larger than in the negro. "Perhaps," adds M. Humboldt, "this race of copper-coloured men, comprehended under the general name of American Indians, is a mixture of Asiatic tribes and the aborigines of this vast continent; and it is not unlikely that the figures with enormous aquiline noses observed in the Mexican hieroglyphic paintings preserved at Vienna, Veletri, and Rome, indicate the physiognomy of some races now extinct." Where the aborigine came from, the learned author does not attempt to inform us. The paintings in question undoubtedly suggest the idea of a race distinct from the present indigenous tribes; but, as the figures distinguished by the peculiarity referred to, appear, for the most part, to be either priests or other dignified personages, it admits of a question whether those extraordinary individuals might not be foreigners, in representing whose appearance the painter would naturally exaggerate the more prominent features. Or if not, they are less likely to have belonged to the ruder aboriginal race, than to the Asiatic ancestry of the conquerors or intruders. It is possible that the Aztec priests might be of a different race from the present Mexican Indians; and few, if any of them, escaped the exterminating sword of Cortes.

Now, the question that arises out of this review of facts, is, are these children the descendants of a race hitherto supposed to be extinct, or are they Aztec Indians—or rather Aztec dwarfs—a kind of Tom Thumb and his sister, imported from Mexico. Their enormous aquiline noses would support the presumption that they are the former: if so, they are not Aztecs, because historians have, with some certainty, fixed the date of the invasion from the north, and the Aztecs themselves tell us, that they know not with certainty what tribe had inhabited the country before the Toltecs. So, if these children belong to a race that flourished previous to the invasion of the Toltecs, it was not the Spaniards that drove them from the plains and valleys of Mexico, but the Toltecs and Aztecs themselves—races which we are, by a curious contradiction, told, these very children are intended to represent. Their facial peculiarities are not Aztec—that is very clear. The Aztec corresponds to the Asiatic, Mongol, and Malay; he is a transplanted Chinese, or Japanese—or, in other words, he belongs to the same common family, the members of which were first separated by distance, and then, in the lapse of time, the memory and tradition of each other's existence gradually faded away on both sides. Besides, the Aztec races have admitted that they were aggressive; and Humboldt, with his usual clearness, shows how they might have passed from one continent to another. He says: "In order to conceive that Asiatic tribes, established on the table-land of Chinese Tartary, should pass from the old to the new continent, it is not necessary to have recourse to high latitudes. A chain of small islands stretches from Corea and Japan to the southern cape of the peninsula of Kamshatka, between the thirty-third and fifty-first degrees of north latitude. Asiatic tribes might have gone by means of these islands from one continent to the other, without going higher on the continent of Asia than the parallel of fifty-five degrees, and by a passage of not more than twenty-four or thirty-six hours." And while indulging in this suggestion, he himself advances the opinion, that the Aztecs might be a part of those Hiong-nues, who, according to the Chinese historians, emigrated under their leader, Punon, and were lost in the northern parts of Siberia, from which they might easily reach the north-western coast of America. Now, if these children are not of Aztec origin, and if there is no imposture in the affair of their alleged discovery, if they are not miserable abortions of some hardy race of Mexican Indians, they are certainly the most interesting beings that have ever been presented to the notice of the scientific, philosophic, and religious world. They represent the race to whom the mounds of both North and South America may be referred; also the ruined cities which the axe and the spade occasionally bring to light, and the older monuments and hieroglyphics of both Peru and Mexico—a race persecuted by, and made the slaves of, the Toltecs, Chichimecs, the Nahuatlacs, and the last invading variety of the same warlike people—the Aztecs

—a race who, liberated by the disruption occasioned by the Spanish invasion, fled into the wilds and recesses of Central America, which were unknown even to the Aztecs; and, there living and marrying amongst each other for ages, unknown to, and unknowing of the rest of mankind, have dwindled down to mere pigmies, possessing the instincts and some of the intelligence, but scarcely a vestige of the higher attributes of our common nature.

ARAB LAW OF BLOOD REVENGE.

ONE of the most remarkable laws in force among the wandering Arabs, and one probably of the highest antiquity, is the law of blood, called the Thar, prescribing the degrees of consanguinity within which it is lawful to revenge a homicide. Although a law rendering a man responsible for blood shed by any one related to him within the fifth degree may appear to members of a civilised community one of extraordinary rigour, and involving almost manifest injustice, it must nevertheless be admitted, that no power vested in any one individual, and no punishment, however severe, could tend more to the maintenance of order and the prevention of bloodshed amongst the wild tribes of the desert. As Burckhardt has justly remarked, "This salutary institution has contributed in a greater degree than any other circumstance, to prevent the warlike tribes of Arabia from exterminating one another." If a man commit a homicide, the cad endeavours to prevail upon the family of the victim to accept a compensation for the blood in money or in kind, the amount being regulated according to custom in different tribes. Should the offer of "blood-money" be refused, the "Thar" comes into operation, and any person within the "khoms," or the fifth degree of blood of the homicide, may be legally killed by any one within the same degree of consanguinity to the victim. This law is enforced between tribes remote from one another, as well as between families, and to the blood revenge may be attributed many of the bitter feuds which exist amongst the Arab clans. It affects, in many respects, their social condition, and has a marked influence upon their habits, and even upon their manners. Thus an Arab will never tell his name, especially if it be an uncommon one, to a stranger; nor mention that of his father or of his tribe, if his own name be ascertained, lest there should be a Thar between them. Even children are taught to observe this custom, that they may not fall victims to blood revenge. Hence the extreme suspicion with which a Bedouin regards a stranger in the open country, or in a tent, and his caution in disclosing anything relating to the movements or dwelling-place of his friends. In most encampments are found refugees, sometimes whole families, who have left their tribe on account of a homicide for which they are amenable. In case, after a murder, persons within the "Thar" take to flight, three days and four hours are by immemorial custom allowed to the fugitives before they can be pursued. Frequently they never return to their friends, but remain with those who give them protection, and become incorporated into the tribe by which they are adopted. Thus, there are families of the Harb, Aneyza, Dhofyr, and other great clans, who for this cause have joined the Shammar, and are now considered part of them. Frequently the homicide himself will wander from tent to tent over the desert, or even rove through the towns and villages on its borders, with a chain round his neck and in rags, begging contributions from the charitable to enable him to pay the apportioned blood-money. I have frequently met such unfortunate persons who have spent years in collecting a small sum.—Layard's Ruins of Nineveh.

When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war.

OLD FLAX.

NEVER, perhaps, in the history of sovereigns, have there been two greater adepts in the art of dissimulation than Elizabeth and the Queen Mother of France—the infamous Catherine de Medicis, who directed the government of her son, the ignorant fanatic, Charles IX. This astute princess had two objects in view. The first was to bring about an union between the English queen and the king her son, or else his younger brother, the Duke D'Anjou; the next, to procure the liberty of the unhappy Mary—not from any generous desire of serving the royal captive, whom she had persecuted and driven from France soon after her widowhood—but to embarrass Elizabeth, whose dread of her heir she well knew.

La Motte Fénelon, the French ambassador, was directed to urge the latter point on every occasion—a duty which he did not neglect; for we find, in his correspondence, that on more than one occasion he boldly remonstrated with her majesty in person, not only on the cruelty but the impolicy of detaining her cousin a captive in the very heart of her dominions; representing such conduct not only as dishonouring to herself, but offensive to every crowned head in Europe.

Besides the imprisonment of Mary, Elizabeth had other causes of embarrassment. Philip II. not only approved of the conduct of the Duke of Alva, but demanded restitution of his treasure—a concession to which the avarice of the queen was decidedly opposed. She had embroiled herself not only with Spain, but with France. The Catholic party, which was still powerful, were indignant at the heiress of the crown being treated like a common felon; and the commercial part of the community were beginning to suffer from the uncertain state of things.

Her haughty spirit and fierce courage supported her through all—even the difficulties and consequences of her own error. Elizabeth not only evaded the payment of the money, but refused to make the least alteration in her treatment of Mary, whom she accused of being ungrateful for the protection she had afforded her.

About this time she wrote the following hypocritical letter to her prisoner, condoling with her on her recent ill-fates.

"May 25, 1569.

"Madame,—To my infinite regret I have learned the great danger in which you have lately been, and I praise God that I heard nothing of it until the worst was past for, in whatever time or place it might have been, such news could have given me little content; but if any such bad accident had befallen you in this country, I believe, really, I should have deemed my days prolonged too long, if, previous to death, I had received such a wound.

"I rely much on His goodness who has always guarded me against mal-accidents, that he will not permit me to fall into such a snare, and that He will preserve me in the good report of the world till the end of my career. He has made me know, by your means, the grief I might have felt if anything ill had happened to you; and I assure you that I will offer up to Him infinite thanksgivings.

"As to the reply that you wish to receive by my Lord Boyd, regarding my satisfaction in the case touching the Duke of Anjou, I neither doubt your honour nor your faith, in writing to me that you never thought of such a thing; but that perhaps some relative, or rather some ambassador of yours having the general authority of your signature, to order all things for the furtherance of your affairs, had adjusted this promise as if it came from you, and deemed it within the range of his commission.

"Such a matter would serve as a spur to a courser of high mettle; for, as we often see a little bough serve to save the life of a swimmer, so a slight shadow of claim animates the combatant. I know not why they (the royal family of France) consider not, that the bark of your good fortune floats on a dangerous sea, where many contrary winds blow, and has need of all aid to obviate such evils, and to conduct you safely into port. And if so be they are able to serve you in aught, still you can in honour deny the intention (of transferring her rights to young Anjou); for if this right abides in them, then to me pertains the wrong.

"Forasmuch I entreat you to have such consideration for me (to whom the like right only pertains, who have merited, on your part, true guerdon and honourable opinion), with such deeds as may preserve the true accord of harmony with mine, who, in all my actions towards you, will never fail of right dealing.

"Howbeit, this bearer will declare to you more amply what I wish in this case. Moreover, if you desire some reply as to the commission given to my Lord Ross (the Bishop of Ross), I believe that you forget how near it touches me if I tamper with aught that I am satisfied touches your honour and my safety. Meantime, I will not fatigue you with this letter longer than that, with my cordial commendations, I pray God to preserve you in good health, and give you long life. From Greenwich."

Elizabeth was too well informed of everything which passed, not to be aware that Mary, whilst in France, had made a will, transferring her claim to the crowns both of England and Scotland, to the royal house of France. Soon after this letter, the young Duke D'Anjou chivalrously executed a deed, by which he renounced all expectations and rights in the event of Mary's death before him. But even this concession did not lessen the implacable hate of the English sovereign towards the heiress of her throne.

The project of marrying the Queen of Scots with the Duke of Norfolk was warmly supported by the Catholic nobility. Even Leicester pretended to approve of it. At the same time he treacherously communicated it to Elizabeth, who first gave an indication of her jealousy and suspicions by observing, that one of the greatest of the realm might shortly be shorter by the head, for meddling in her affairs: a hint which the duke was either too much enamoured or too ambitious to take.

On one occasion, she openly taxed him with his design. But simple as the duke was, he did not permit himself to be caught with the pretended frankness of his cousin. He firmly and positively denied it, adding, that he had never entertained, or could entertain, any serious idea of marrying a woman who was not only the enemy of her majesty, but whose husband could not hope to sleep in peace.

This degrading observation for awhile lulled the suspicions of the queen; but they soon broke forth again with redoubled violence.

Shortly after this, the duke retired from court to his seat in Norfolk, where he remained till summoned to return by the queen, by whose order he was arrested on his arrival at Burnham, and committed to the Tower.

When there, he was severely questioned by the commissioners appointed by the council, amongst whom were the Lord Keeper Bacon and Cecil. But even they, devoted as they were to the interests and projects of Elizabeth, could not find any legal offence of which he had been guilty.

Never had the virgin monarch displayed her revengeful, obstinate disposition so strongly as at this period. Her hatred of Norfolk amounted almost to insanity, when the report was presented to her, in which the commissioners declared that they could not find the duke guilty of any offence which the law could reach. She fell into a violent rage, and tore the paper with her own hands.

"All alike!" she exclaimed; "all leagued against me!"

"But how, without some crime committed," demanded the Lord Keeper, "will it be possible, please your majesty, to convict the duke, who is of too high a lineage and supported by alliances too powerful to be treated like a common personage?"

"What the law fails to do," replied the queen, with a vindictive smile, "my authority shall effect! If those to whom I have intrusted the safeguard of my throne prove lukewarm, I must supply their place with more faithful councillors! What, my lords," she added, "shall this duke conspire against his sovereign—deceive her with a foul, degrading lie—and yet escape unpunished? He would marry the Queen of Scots: ere I permitted such an act of treachery and rebellion, not only the head of Norfolk, but a loftier one shall fall!"

Those present regarded each other with consternation: it was the first time, perhaps, that Elizabeth had glanced at the possibility of bringing her cousin and heir to trial and execution—crimes which she afterwards accomplished with the assistance of some of those very men.

So great was the violence of Elizabeth on this occasion, that it is recorded she fell back in a fit, and had to be taken by her women to her chamber, and her physician sent for.

The hint of changing her ministers was not unnoticed by the Commons, who appear, however, on this occasion to have acted with consistency and honour.

The imprisonment of the Duke of Norfolk in the Tower was followed by a rebellion in the north of England, headed by the powerful Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, who were both Catholics. Their object was not only to restore the ancient faith, but to procure the liberation of Mary, whose patience and misfortunes had made her very popular in the north, where the Catholic religion still prevailed. The rebels were quickly dispersed: Northumberland fled to Scotland, but was quickly given up to the vengeance of Elizabeth by Murray, and brought to the block; his more fortunate colleague escaped from the kingdom, and died in exile, in great poverty.

Sussex was, it is to be presumed, compelled to disgrace his reputation on this occasion by his implacable mistress, who ordered him to massacre the insurgents without pity or remorse—an office which he fulfilled but too well: the country was deluged with the blood of the deluded yeomen and peasantry.

It was on this occasion that Elizabeth indulged her poetical vein, in the following lines. The threat conveyed in them was executed to the hideous letter.

The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy,
And wit me warns to shun such snares as threaten mine annoy;
For falsehood now doth flow, and subjects' faith doth ebb,
Which would not be if Reason ruled, or Wisdom wove the web;
But clouds of toys untied do cloak aspiring minds,
Which turn to rain of late repent, by course of changed winds.
The top of hope, supposed, the root of ruth will be;
And fruitless all their grafted guiles, as ye shall shortly see.
These dazzled eyes with pride which great ambition blinds,
Shall be unseated by worthy wights, whose foresight falsehood binds.

The daughter of debate, that eke discord doth sow,
Shall reap no gain, where former rule hath taught still peace to grow.

No foreign banish'd wight shall anchor in this port;
Our realm it brooks no stranger's force, let them elsewhere resort;
Our rusty sword with rest shall first his edge employ,
To poll their tops that seek such change, and gaze for joy.

The daughter of debate shows how fiercely she resented the least discussion on the subject.

Early in May, that same year, a bull of excommunication was found affixed to the gates of St. Paul's Cathedral, emanating from the Pope, Pius V., whose zeal was stirred by the sufferings of the Catholics, and the captivity of the Queen of Scots and Norfolk. The gentleman who had the hardihood to affix it, was discovered and put to death.

The bull not only excommunicated Elizabeth, but pretended to release her subjects from their oaths of allegiance; and when it is remembered the influence which such a sentence still exercised over the Catholic portion of her subjects, the consternation of the queen can scarcely be wondered at. She even forgot her dignity so far as to solicit its revocation—but in vain.

One good effect at least may partly be attributed to it. It was one of the means, backed by the representations of her ministers, which induced her to consent to the release of Norfolk from the Tower, who was permitted to take up his abode at the Charter House, where he remained, a sort of prisoner at large, under the ward of Sir Henry Neville.

This is one of the darkest epochs in the reign of the Protestant queen, who even outdid her father in cruelty. Sussex, by her command, burnt and destroyed upwards of three hundred villages in the north: so pitiless was she in her rage—so vindictive in her resentments.

Three hundred villages destroyed—mothers, infants, driven from their homes and slaughtered—to gratify the resentment of their sovereign at the rebellion of their misguided sons and husbands! It exceeded the cruelties even of the reign of Mary. The following letter, from the Earl of Sussex to Sir George Bowes, whose very name is a dishonour to the gentry of England, proves not only the orders of the queen, but the rigour with which they were executed.

"SIR GEORGE BOWES,—I have set the numbers to be executed down in every town, as I did in your other book, which draweth near to two hundred; wherein you may use your discretion in taking more or less in every town, as you shall see just cause for the offences and fitness for example; so as, in the whole, you pass not of all kind of such the number of two hundred, amongst whom you may not execute any that hath freeholds, or noted wealthy, for so is the queen's majesty's pleasure. By her special commandment, 10th of January, 1569-70. T. SUSSEX."

Humanity turns with loathing from the recital of these horrors. Other letters published on the history of the northern rebellion, prove that the earl wrote again several times to his instrument, urging on the executions. "I received last night," he says, "letters from the court, whereby I perceive that the queen's majesty doth much marvel that she doth not hear from me that the execution is yet ended, and that she is disburthened of her charges that were considered for that respect; and therefore I heartily pray you to use expedition, for I fear this lingering will breed displeasure to us both."

Who, after reading these letters, from undoubted historical sources, will sigh for the return of the days of "Good Queen Bess?"

CHAPTER XLVII.

A mother's heart foresees and guards 'gainst all.

OLD PLAY.

WHATEVER may be the variety of opinions of the guilt or innocence of the unhappy Queen of Scots, there can be only one as to the cruelty of Elizabeth, in holding her for so many years, while still in the prime of life, a captive; or of her unnatural brother, Murray, whom she had trusted and loaded with benefits, betraying her.

Like most bold and ambitious men, the crafty regent calculated little on the desperation—the reckless daring—which outrage will sometimes inspire, even in the heart of the timid—how much more in the brave and resolute man!

A noble gentleman, whom Murray had persecuted because of his adherence to the fortunes of his legitimate sovereign—driven his wife desperate, by luring her from the shelter of her home, in the midst of an inclement night—assassinated him, as he made his public entrance into Stirling: an act which, although it can never be palliated, yet those who reflect on the character of the age will not wonder at.

This change in the government of Scotland appeared to open a better prospect for the long-captive queen; whose friends—both in her own kingdom and in France—entreated Elizabeth to restore her to liberty and her crown: a concession which she promised, under certain conditions, to make; but she well knew Mary would rather consent to pass the rest of her days in prison than accept it.

This promise was made to the friends of Mary in France.

It was nothing more than the gratification of her old scheme of obtaining possession of the infant James, whom she desired, she said, "to hold as a hostage for the fidelity of his mother."

Mary, who by this time knew her dissimulating cousin, nobly refused to listen to her offers, and the Scottish lords of the congregation were equally indignant at an attempt to obtain possession of the person of their infant king. They felt that, independent of the danger to the child, it would be the destruction of their own power; for the indignation of the nation would be sure to punish them, even if the English queen did not deprive them of their authority, under pretence of administering the government for her ward.

Elizabeth was courted and mistrusted by all parties in Scotland. They feared her power, whilst they hated and despised her character—which was branded throughout Europe for dissimulation, avarice, and cruelty.

On the 23rd of January, 1571, Queen Elizabeth proceeded in great state to the City, to dine with Sir Thomas Gresham, and open the magnificent building which he had erected entirely at his own expense, as a place of meeting for merchants—called, in the language of the day, a Bourse, or purse.

Her reception in the City appears to have been one continued triumph, so well was she received by the citizens. After dining with the munificent founder, she visited the new pile, which was brilliantly illuminated in every part; and so gratified did she feel, that she caused the heralds to proclaim it, by sound of trumpet, the Royal Exchange.

In our own day, we have seen the sovereign lady who so worthily fills the throne of this commercial and free country, open, in similar state, the noble edifice which stands upon the site of the princely merchant's exchange which was destroyed a few years since by fire.

The natural fickleness of Elizabeth appeared yet more strongly at this period of her life, from the renewal of the negotiations for her marriage with the youthful Duke D'Anjou—who might well have been her son, as far as age was concerned. To those of her ministers who ventured to oppose so preposterous a match, she showed herself resentful, instead of being grateful for an advice which saved her from such folly. Even her favourite, Cecil, now Lord Burleigh, came in for a share of her displeasure. At one period the experienced statesman doubtless wished his sovereign to marry, as a means of terminating all dissensions on the subject of the succession; but now, when the probability of her having issue was at an end, he pertinaciously opposed it: possibly he dreaded the influence of a young husband over the heart and understanding of Elizabeth—therefore he laboured to prevent it.

The minister's plans were unexpectedly furthered by the resistance to the match made by the French prince himself.

Whilst the treaty was in progress, the Duke D'Anjou, deeming that it would end like all other negotiations on the same subject, took but little interest in the matter; but no sooner did he hear that they had advanced to a point when it was necessary he should take a share in the proceedings, than he drew out a declaration that he would never consent to marry the English queen.

Amongst his other objections was, that she had a sore leg, adding, that Elizabeth was ugly and old. He even appealed to the king, his brother, and urged such grave objections against the character of the proposed bride, that the match was broken off, to the dreadful mortification of the English queen.

Catherine De Medici, the Queen Mother of France, tried to persuade Elizabeth to accept the younger brother of the duke instead—the Duke D'Alençon—which proposition, preposterous as it was, the virgin queen for some time secretly entertained, and corresponded with the artful Catherine on the subject.

The prince proposed was only sixteen years of age, and, as his mother observed, in one of her confidential epistles to her minister, La Motte Fénelon, "little of his age!"

What a contemptible idea she must have entertained of the vanity and weakness of Elizabeth! The wily Florentine was not far wrong, judging her merely as a woman; it is as a sovereign only that the heiress of the Plantagenets and Tudors is entitled to the epithet of "great."

The lords of the congregation arrived at last in England, and were admitted to her presence. She received them at first with much affability, expecting, no doubt, that they would commence by an attempt to prove the guilt of Mary.

But the Earl of Morton chose a higher ground. He was a fanatic of the school of Geneva; and, when Burleigh asked him, in the presence of the queen, upon what grounds the lords of the congregation justified their deposing of their natural sovereign, made answer:

"That Scotland was an independent nation!"

"We know that!" interrupted Elizabeth; "and have no wish to question the independence of our neighbour—or that of its nobles!" she added, somewhat sarcastically.

Doubtless she remembered the large sums which most of the great lords had received at her hands.

"We possess the right," continued the earl, "to depose the sovereign, for misconduct, unquestioned by mortal power—being amenable only to God."

"And where find you this pretty authority?" demanded the queen, impatiently—for, with all her hatred of Mary, she could not bear to hear such doctrines advanced in her presence.

"From the authority of Calvin!"

"Were your authority—your Calvin," she replied, haughtily, "in my dominions, and to broach such doctrines, I would have his tongue torn from the root of his mouth, and his body shortened by the head! Get from my sight!" she added; "such doctrines are subversive of all authority—offensive alike to God and man: compose your differences as you may—I will interfere no more between you!"

A RIDE DOWN THE NILE.

HERE, where I expected to ride through a wilderness, find a garden. Ethiopia might become in other hands the richest and most productive part of Africa. The people are industrious and peaceable, and deserve better masters. Their dread of the Turks is extreme, and so is their hatred. I stopped one evening at a village on the western bank. The sailors were sent to the houses to procure eggs and fowls, and after a time two men appeared, bringing, as they said, the only chicken in the place. They came up slowly, stooped and touched the ground, signifying that they were as dust before our feet. Achmet paid them the thirty paras they demanded, and when they supposed the Turk had no disposition to cheat them, they went back and brought more fowls. Travellers who go by the land-route give the people an excellent character for hospitality. I am informed that it is almost impossible to buy anything, even when double the value of the article is tendered; but by asking for it as a favour, they will cheerfully give you whatever they have.

On the third day I saw the hippopotamus. The men discerned him about a quarter of a mile off, as he came up to breathe, and called my attention to him. Our vessel was run towards him, and the sailors shouted, to draw his attention:

"How is your wife, old boy?" "Is your son married yet?" and other like exclamations. They insisted on it that his curiosity would be excited by this means, and he would allow us to approach. I saw him at last within a hundred yards, but only the enormous head, which was more than three feet across the ears. He raised it with a tremendous snort, opening his huge mouth at the same time, and a more frightful monster I never saw. He came up in our wake after we had passed, and followed us for some time. Directly afterwards we espied five crocodiles on a sand-bank. One of them was of a greyish colour, and upwards of twenty-five feet in length. We approached quietly to within a few yards of them, when my men raised their poles and shouted. The beasts started from their sleep and dashed quickly into the water, the big yellow one striking so violently against the hull, that I am sure he went off with the headache.

SELLING A WIFE.—A case of selling a wife actually and bonâ fide happened in the provincial town in which I resided about 18 years ago. A man publicly sold his wife at the market-cross for 15*l*. The buyer carried her away with him some seven miles off, and she lived with him till his death. The seller and the buyer are now both dead, but the woman is alive, and is married to a third (or a second) husband. The legality of the transaction has, I believe, some chance of being tried, as she now claims some property belonging to her first husband (the seller), her right to which is questioned, in consequence of her supposed alienation by sale.

[THE MOSQUE OF ST. SOPHIA.]

THE MOSQUE OF ST. SOPHIA, AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

WITH the exception of the Temple of Solomon, of which no authenticated traces exist, probably no edifice in the world has experienced greater vicissitudes or witnessed more revolutions than the Mosque of St. Sophia, in Constantinople. It has survived the fall of the Eastern empire, the growth and decay of the Ottoman empire, and been the dumb spectator of the rise and progress of that colossal power in the north which first received Christianity from its bosom, and now not only aspires to restore it to its original purpose, but menaces the powers which have their foundations deeply fixed in Western Europe. This is an age of transition; and as we have seen many changes, no doubt it is our destiny to see many more; but the changes which have occurred in the world and in society since the Mosque of St. Sophia was first erected, border on the marvellous. It has witnessed the rise and progress of the Christian religion, its unnatural and fatal schisms, its overthrow in the East by the barbarous Turk, and the almost simultaneous discovery of a new world; it has also witnessed the invention of printing, the extraordinary development of civilisation in the West, almost magical discoveries in science, and their application to the industrial arts, and those innumerable revelations in knowledge which, we trust, are safely conducting the whole family of mankind to a happier as well as more brilliant future. Thinking over all this, and firmly believing that, sooner or later—perhaps sooner than even the enemies of Turkey anticipate—Christianity, as interpreted by the Greek church, will once again be the dominant religion in the East, with its metropolis at Constantinople, we deemed it would be acceptable to our readers to have presented to them an engraving of the material features of the renowned church of St. Sophia.

The present building, however, is not the original Christian edifice. Constantine the Great was the first that erected a chapel, bearing the name of St. Sophia, to the "Wisdom of the Uncreated Word." Constantius, his son, either enlarged this chapel, or caused a new one to be erected on its site. The sanctuary and the greatest part of this building were destroyed during the tumult which had been excited against St. John Chrysostom. It was again burnt under Honorius, and re-established by young Theodosius, only to be again destroyed in the fifth year of Justinian, during the insurrection which placed Hypatius on the throne, against his own inclination. Justinian, however, having quelled the sedition in the next five years, caused the present stately edifice to be erected. On its completion, the emperor was so elated that he exclaimed: "I have outdone thee, O Solomon!" But in the thirty-second year of his reign, an earthquake threw down the dome, and crushed the altar in its fall—so that it had to be re-edified and consecrated anew. The Emperor Basil, the Macedonian, caused the western dome to be strengthened; and in the reign of Anne and John Paleologus, the church was so injured by an earthquake, that it had to be repaired out of the marriage portion the emperor received with Helen, daughter of Cantacuzenus. This was the last reparation it received at Christian hands; and it may be remarked, that during the whole time it stood as a Greek church, it, like the spiritual church it was intended to accommodate, was always in trouble. One day it was a revolution, another an earthquake—but always something to disturb the equanimity of both the visible and invisible edifice.

But its trouble was yet to come. It was used as a Christian edifice until the 29th of May, 1453. On that day the accomplished and execrable Mahommed II. converted it into a Mussulman mosque.

The Turks, having conquered all the provinces of the Greek Christian empire—a policy the Russians of the present day are faithfully and significantly imitating—advanced to the gates of Constantinople. On the 6th of April, 1453, the imperial standard of the besiegers was planted before the gate of St. Romanos; and after a siege of fifty-three days, the city, which had defied even Tamerlane, Bajazet, and the Khalifs, was irretrievably subdued by the arms of Mahommed II. "Her empire only," says Gibbon, "had been subverted by the Latins. Her religion was trampled in the dust by her Moslem conquerors."

Rapine and cruelty prevailed in Constantinople until the eighth hour of the same day, when Mahommed, attended by his viziers, bashaws, and guards, each of whom, says a Byzantine historian, was robust as Hercules, dexterous as Apollo, and equal to ten of any of the ordinary race of mortals, proceeded through the city to the principal door of St. Sophia, where he alighted from his horse, and entered the dome. Such was his zealous regard for that monument of his glory, that, on observing a zealous Turk in the act of breaking the marble pavement, he admonished with his scimeter—a peculiarity still observable in Turkey—that if the spoil and captives were granted to the soldiers, the public and private buildings had been reserved for the prince. So commanding, he seated himself on the great altar, Turkish fashion; and, after saying his prayers, he caused himself to be shaved, then smoked a pipe, and, after due meditation, rose, and fastened to one of the pillars of the archiepiscopal throne a fine piece of embroidered cloth, with Arabic characters on it, which had served as a screen in the mosque of Mecca. On the same day, the muezzin or orier ascended the most lofty turret, and proclaimed the exan, or public invitation in the name of God and the Prophet. Thus fell the church in which the Christian mysteries had so lately been celebrated before the last of the Cæsars. Well might Mahommed exclaim, as he did, when he entered the palace of the unfortunate Constantine:

"The spider has wove his web in the imperial palace, and the owl hath sung her watch-song on the towers of Agramsiab!"

The building is very finely situated—being placed at the top of the ancient Byzantium, on an eminence that descends down to the sea, by the point of the seraglio. In size it is next to St. Peter's, at Rome, but it has a very unwieldy appearance. There is massiveness, but little or no beauty. In construction it is in the form of a Greek cross, which almost makes it square, and the dome—its great feature—rests outwardly on four very thick towers, which of late years have been added, to strengthen this vast building, and render it more secure, in a country where whole cities are often overthrown by earthquakes.

Although, when viewed by strangers, it disappoints the expectation—no monument of a remote Christian era exceeds it in dimensions and integrity. The Turks, barbarous as they were, only destroyed the ornaments and objects of superstition; the building they preserved entire, and ever after held in religious veneration. What they might do, should the Russians be in the act of storming Constantinople, we cannot tell; but this is certain, that there are thousands of fanatics among them, who, rather than see it fall into the hands of the detested Muscovite, would gladly volunteer to send it, along with themselves, in broken and crashing fragments to the smoke-begrimed and gunpowder-stained sky. Some Italian patriots, (?) within the past four years, threatened to bestow the same fate on the Vatican—so that no relic of antiquity is safe in these days of change, fear, and perplexity in the political atmosphere.

However, to descend from the regions of speculation to those of detail, as our readers will have perceived from our illustration, the Mosque of St. Sophia, in its external appearance, is that of a vast building whose construction requires a proportionate heaviness of mass, to preserve it standing and entire. The weighty buttresses, and the attached compartments of the temple, falling, in a succession of pent-houses, from the spring of the arch to within a few feet of the ground, nearly conceal and totally ruin any effect which might otherwise be produced by the height and expanse of its far-famed dome. The interior, to which you descend by five steps, seems at first sight magnificently spacious, and not broken with the aisles, choirs, nor deformed by the railings and tombs of modern churches; but your admiration diminishes as you proceed with your inspection. The beauty of the variegated, marble floor is concealed by a covering of mats; and the dome, as well as the body of the building, is spoiled by thousand little cords depending from the summit, within four feet of the pavement, and having at the end of them lamps of coloured glass, large ostrich eggs, artificial horse-tails, vases and globes of crystal, and other mean ornaments. The columns appear too large for the arches which they support, and the carving of their capitals can scarcely be more painful to the eyes of an architect than to those of a common observer. Architects knew not to what order they belonged, or by what name to describe their style, unless a sort of Gothicised Greek. From a change in the arrangement of the sanctuary, the line of the nave does not seem at right angles with the large circular recess, called in former times Ochelon, in which the Christian altar was placed; for the marble pulpit of the Imam, with its attached flight of steps, projects from the left side of it, and the mats, together with a descent of two steps, being so arranged as to give another direction to the cord of the arc, the whole of one wing, and the grand diameter of the base, have an appearance of distortion. The alteration has been caused by the desire of the Mahometans to point the centre of the sanctuary directly towards Mecca, which, being formerly due east, is, by the above contrivance, drawn a little to the southward of that quarter. At this new centre is a niche, with a large chandelier on each side, called the Mirabe, or Maharabe, which is the repository of the Koran. The upper part of the walls is defaced by little squares of red, white, and blue paint. The great eight-winged seraphims are fading fast away. The tessellated mosaic with which the concave above the windows and the dome are incrustated, and specimens of which, taken from the ceiling of an adjoining oratory, are sold to strangers, is not visible to those standing in the body of the mosque. It is composed of very minute squares, formed of some vitreous substance, gilded and tinged with paint. The upper part of the walls is heavy and dark, and the heaven-suspended vault scarcely rises into an arch, but shows, indeed, an inward depression from the summit towards the centre of the cupola. With a diameter of one hundred and fifteen feet, it is only eighteen in depth, and not more than one hundred and eighty from the pavement. The closing of the arcades of the upper Gynaikonion, or female gallery, where there is now only a railed ledge large enough to enable the servants of the mosque to walk round and light the lamps, has contributed to the heavy darkness of the dome. The general impression is, that the skill of the one hundred architects, and the labour of the ten thousand workmen, the wealth of an empire, and the ingenuity of presiding angels, has only raised a stupendous monument of the heavy mediocrity which distinguished the productions of the sixth century from the perfect specimens of a happier age. The general style of its ornaments showed that it was calculated for nocturnal illuminations. All was gilt and gaudy colouring; and the emperor would have inlaid the pavement with solid gold, if his astrologers had not warned him that the building would be diapidated by his needy successors. It must indeed have a brilliant appearance, when lighted by its myriads of lamps, and its vaults may glitter like the firmament; but this is the excellence of a theatre, rather than of a temple, and may be found where the skill of the architect and sculptor is required in vain.

Such is the Mosque of St. Sophia, which it does not require the power of vaticination to foretell, is destined to play as important a part in the affairs of the Greek Christian Church in the East, as St. Peter's has done in the affairs of its great antagonist, the Latin Church. What the ultimate issue will be none can foretell; but it appears certain and irrevocable that Turkey must fall as much from collapse as pressure from without, and that the re-establishment of the Greek metropolitan church, on the ruins of the material faith and discipline of the Moslems, can scarcely fail to prove advantageous to the civilisation of the whole world.

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

THE JESUIT, "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER CXXXIII.

A heavy summons lies like lead upon me.

SHAKESPEARE.

ALTHOUGH Captain Herbert was one of the least superstitious persons in the world, he could not dismiss the presentiment he felt that the approaching encounter would prove fatal to him. It followed him like his shadow—haunted alike his sleeping and his waking hours.

As the day of meeting approached, the impression became stronger, and the evening before he started for Calais, he passed several hours in writing: when he had done he carefully sealed the papers, and placed the packet in the breast pocket of his travelling coat.

At an early hour the following morning he was to breakfast with his uncle, previous to starting for Calais with his second.

"Upon my honour, George," observed the general, when he saw him enter the room, "but this is ridiculous! You look as pale as a young recruit who has never stood fire! I should be sorry to think that you were afraid."

The captain replied, that from any other party he should resent even the supposition of such a weakness; adding, that he never felt in better nerve in his life.

"Well, well!" continued the old roué, whose amiability was not increased by his early rising; "it may be as you say. By-the-by," he added, in a careless tone, "have you ever seen your antagonist?"

"I have seen him!" replied the ex-Guardsman, with a shudder. "He is the living counterpart of his dead brother."

"That's unfortunate!"

His nephew looked as if he thought so, too.

"On me," continued the general, "it would make little or no impression—yet I can understand your feeling: it is like shooting the same fellow over again—for you must shoot him," he added, with a marked emphasis on the word "must." "It is the only way of extricating yourself from a false position. You should have been more careful."

"Careful, general?"

"Yes," continued the heartless man of the world; "careful. Never, in affairs of this kind, give a chance away. You ought not to have suffered Mottram to book the bet—that was your first error. Your second was in repeatedly refusing to see his servant when he called. You ought to have known that such visits were not visits of ceremony."

Herbert reflected for an instant. He could not understand how his uncle became so thoroughly acquainted with his affairs.

"You have seen Colonel Vandeleur?" he said.

"No."

"Captain Mottram, then?"

"Neither one nor the other," answered the old man, drily. "A little more maraschino in my coffee," he added, at the same time passing his cup to his nephew. "There—thank you—that will do! George!"

"Well, sir?"

"You certainly want tact."

The captain had sufficient tact to understand at last how the general was so well informed; and he mentally resolved to discharge his valet the instant he returned from Calais.

"Not so much as you imagine, sir," was the reply.

"Ah! I know to what you allude," exclaimed the general; "your arrangement with Colonel Vandeleur, that the memorandum-book should be at the disposal of the survivor. That would be all very well, if—not that I presume there is much doubt upon the point—if we could be certain which will be the survivor!"

"By heavens!" said his nephew, nettled at the cool, easy tone in which he alluded to the possibility of his falling by the hand of Captain Mottram, "you speak as if my death would please you!"

"By no means, George," was the reply; "it would inconvenience me sadly; and you know how much I detest being put out of my usual way."

"Heartless egotist!" thought the captain.

"Conceited puppy!" mentally observed the general; "to suppose for an instant that he has any other merit in my eyes beyond being my nephew, and, to avoid trouble, my heir!"

How many men are there in the world who both feel and act like General Bouchier—reckless of the feelings and happiness of others, whilst they are instinctively alive to their own. The evening preceding the above conversation he had received a letter from the unhappy Isabel, in which she betrayed and cruelly abandoned wife appealed to his honour and generosity—explaining her apparent dereliction from duty with the major, and informing him that she was soon likely to become a mother.

"Brand not my unborn child," she concluded, "with illegitimacy! Let not my innocent babe suffer for its mother's folly!"

As well might the despairing mother have appealed to the statue of Moloch, at whose blood-stained shrine her infant was about to be offered an unconscious sacrifice—the hideous idol could not have been more insensible.

A similar letter had been sent to her husband—what effect it produced upon the captain time will show.

The breakfast dispatched, the hour of parting arrived. Lord Ilford and the cornet called for their principal in the travelling chariot of the peer.

"Do you require any money?" demanded the general, as the groom of the chambers announced them, at the opening his pocket-book.

A dry negative was the response.

The old man looked surprised—it was the first time in his life his nephew had declined such an offer.

"Stay!" said the ex-Guardsman, recollecting himself; "there is no knowing what may occur—and a hundred or two—"

"There are five!" replied his uncle, handing the notes with a smile.

The young man drew the letter which he had written the previous evening from his pocket, broke the seal, and inclosed them. Just as he had re-sealed the packet, the peer and Cornet Graham entered the breakfast-room.

"We must be off, George," observed his lordship; "the packet thirtieth at eight; and it would be very inconvenient to mither the tide—fortunately I have ordered hortheth on the woad!"

"Very fortunate!" echoed the cornet.

The duellist answered, with a sigh, that he was ready.

"Your pistols are in order, I suppose?" observed the general.

"Yes."

"Manton's, of course? Be cool!" he whispered, as he shook hands with his nephew, "and hit him in the head or heart—no matter which—but avoid a flesh-wound: in nine cases out of ten, your man recovers—and Mottram must not quit the ground alive!"

"He shall not, if I can help it!"

And so they parted—no word of sympathy—no gush of feeling between them: as the general said, his nephew was a convenience. The tie which bound them to each other, was interest on one side and selfishness upon the other.

"The fool is sure to get hit!" muttered the affectionate uncle, as soon as the captain and his seconds had taken their departure. "I never knew a man meet his antagonist in such a humour, that he came back alive! I wish the fellow had my nerve!"

With this cool observation, General Bouchier rang the bell, and directed his valet to bring fresh coffee.

About the same hour the following day, the parties met upon the sands at Calais. Whatever the feelings and presentiments of Captain Herbert—pride enabled him to repress them. He appeared as indifferent and self-possessed as if engaged in a party of pleasure; the countenance of his antagonist was scornful and resolute.

"He ith very like hith brother!" observed Lord Ilford, raising his glass, and eyeing Captain Mottram—for, in addition to his lip, the peer appeared to be short-sighted.

"Very!" echoed the cornet.

Herbert replied only by a slight shudder—the resemblance to the major appalled him.

"Hit him in the thame plathe, George," continued his lordship; "moth likely he ith weaketh there: thome people are vewy weak in the head!"

"Exceedingly!" said Graham, not without a sly glance at the speaker.

Colonel Vandeleur and the peer retired to arrange the preliminaries. It was proposed that the parties, at a given signal, should fire at a distance of twenty paces; that if the first shots missed, the distance should be reduced to fifteen; and on a second failure, to ten paces.

"Thith ith vewy mudmouth!" observed Lord Ilford to the colonel—from whom the proposition had emanated, and who pertinaciously adhered to his point.

"Your lordship forgets," was the reply, "that the provocation has been deadly!"

"Don't egthactly know what to thay," continued the peer; "we never fight tho in the Guardth!"

"I dare say not!" drily observed the old soldier; "but you can refer to your principal, my lord! If he objects, it will then be for me to state the reasons which induce Captain Mottram and myself to insist upon them!"

"Yeth—yeth! vewy pwoper!" said his lordship. "I'll hear what George thayth!"

"Anything!" impatiently exclaimed Herbert, when his friend had conveyed to him the proposal of Colonel Vandeleur; "it signifies little—there will be no occasion for a second shot!"

"I hope not!" ejaculated Graham; "you can't fail to hit him!"

"Of courthe not," observed the peer; "it would be, tho ektheedingly widiculouth for a Guardthman to be thot by one of the line—contwary to all etiquette; and I'm a gweat thtickler for etiquette!"

The terms were finally agreed upon; and the two seconds agreed to throw a guinea in the air, to see which of them should give the signal.

"Shall I call to your lordship?" demanded the colonel.

"No! Let me call to you!" lisped the peer, who had a great objection to taking off his gloves. "Head!"

"Chance is against you!" said the old soldier.

"Vewy odd!" said the Guardsman; "but headth are alwayh againtth me!"

The grim smile which flitted for an instant over the features of Captain Mottram's second was the best commentary upon the observation of the noble speaker.

The antagonists at last were placed upon the ground, facing each other—their hands ready for murder. However society may palliate the custom, or sophistry cast its veil over it, duelling is murder—humanity abhors it, and only false honour can justify it.

"Ilford!" said Captain Herbert.

"Well?"

"Should I fall?"

"Fall!" interrupted the peer; "how vewy widiculouth!"

"Still it is possible," continued his principal; "you will find a sealed packet in my pocket: promise me to deliver it with your own hands to—" He would have said Isabel, but somehow the word quivered upon his lips—so he substituted for the name of the woman he had so cruelly injured, "to Mrs. Herber!"

"Thertainly—if you with it!"

"I do wish it, most sincerely—remember, with your own hands; and above all, do not let General Bouchier know of it!"

The peer nodded, to intimate that he perfectly understood him, and withdrew with Graham to a short distance, whilst Colonel Vandeleur gave the signal. Both raised their arms, and fired deliberately.

"Good gwaithouth!" exclaimed Lord Ilford, as Captain Herbert, who had received his antagonist's ball through his heart, bounded several feet from the sands, and then fell back a corpse. "George ith hit!"

"By one of the line, too!" added Cornet Graham, with an expression of intense disgust; "quite a discredit upon the Guards!"

"Quite!" answered the peer, emphatically.

The victor had not entirely escaped—the bullet from Captain Herbert's pistol had pierced his side: he was severely wounded, but not mortally.

"Is he dead?" he demanded, as he leaned on the shoulder of Colonel Vandeleur for support.

"Shot through the heart!" was the reply.

"My brother is avenged!" said the wounded man, with an air of satisfaction. "I have done my duty!"

The difficulties which would probably result from the duel had been foreseen. Lord Ilford, after directing his servant to convey the body of his friend to Calais, stepped into his carriage, followed by Graham—but not till they had both taken a ceremonious leave of Vandeleur and Mottram—and started for Ostend. As their passports were perfectly en règle, and the postillions well paid, they reached the frontiers of the Netherlands before the French authorities could intercept them.

It would be fruitless to try such a project now. The electric telegraph performs the functions of the police, and the fugitive is arrested at the very moment he deems that he has escaped the laws he has braved. From Ostend the two seconds sailed to England.

When the general was informed of his nephew's death, he appeared unusually excited. It was not sorrow he displayed, but annoyance. Miss Pepper rose like an ill-omened shadow before him.

"Curse the fellow!" he muttered; "had he only married her, all this might have been spared!"

At the thought, his hatred to the unhappy Isabel increased. Although possessed of little feeling, General Bouchier was a strict stickler for the proprieties of life. He dined that day alone. Whether it was that he had indulged too freely, or that the vexation he had undergone had affected him, he complained to his valet, as he assisted him to undress, of an oppression about the head—in any other man, probably, it would have been at the heart.

"Shall I send for Sir Henry Halford?" demanded the domestic.

"No; the morning will do. I feel sleepy; doubtless it will pass away."

The valet, however, was far from being satisfied, and ventured to remind his master that he had not lately been cupped—an operation which the general was in the habit of indulging in every month.

"No matter!" exclaimed the old man, pettishly; "it will have passed in the morning!"

The speaker was right. In the morning it had passed away, and with it the life of the heartless voluptuary—who was discovered, cold and dead in his bed, by his valet.

As he died intestate, his immense wealth, which would have descended to Captain Herbert, eventually fell to his unborn heir, which Isabel died in giving birth to—but not till she had seen her reputation fully established by the confession of her husband, which Lord Ilford delivered into her own hands.

The mercenary grandmother of the helpless infant—the widow of the infamous Colonel Mowbray—tried every scheme to get appointed guardian to the child; but, being defeated, finally retired to Boulogne, where she lived, miserable and dissatisfied, upon the annuity which her first husband had left her, despised by all who knew her.

CHAPTER CXXXIV.

Peace—the charm's wound up.

SHAKESPEARE.

ALTHOUGH the suit between Sir William Mowbray and the executors was in every sense of the word a friendly one, yet—thanks to the proverbial delay of the law—nearly three months elapsed before the right of our hero to the name of which he had been so long deprived was firmly established, beyond the possibility of any future litigation. The time, however, was not passed unhappily. In the society of Ellen the hours flew lightly, poised on the wings of love and hope.

The important decision was at last pronounced, and nothing remained but the formal consent of the Chancellor to his marriage—which, as there was no longer any inequality of birth or fortune to be alleged, that high functionary, after some little hesitation, gave.

Not to have hesitated would have been, in the late Lord Eldon, to have done violence to his conscience, and belied the precepts of his life. His was made up of doubts and hesitations; he doubted everything—his own judgment—even himself, at last.

It was the wish of Ellen that her marriage should be celebrated at Carrow—and as it was one of those few points in which the will of the lady is law, Sir William acceded to it. Orders were accordingly given for their return to Carrow—the Duchess of Devonshire, whose stay in England was limited, accompanying them.

What a picture of felicity did the happy lover draw from a life of usefulness and virtue, passed in the midst of the inheritance so unexpectedly become his. Improving the condition of his tenantry, emulating the virtues of his father, Ellen for his wife—Ellen to be the mother of his children. At times he felt intoxicated at the prospect of his bliss—it seemed too great to be real.

If the happiness of the fair girl who had endured so much was of a more tranquil nature, it was equally deep and real—for her heart went with her hand—her pure, unsullied heart, rich in woman's truth and love's first sympathies—sweet as the flower fresh with spring's earliest dew, ere the sun-god's rays have drunk their perfumed breath.

Such a heart is the most precious gift heaven can bestow, or man receive.

It was arranged that Joe Beans—the faithful Joe—and Susan should be married at the same time: the worthy rector willingly agreeing to tie the nuptial knot for both.

The evening before their departure, Sir William Mowbray was informed that the Khan wished to see him: and, descending to the library, he found his long-supposed parent prepared for a journey. A chaise, too, was waiting at the door.

"What!" said our hero, "do you start for Carrow before us?"

"Not for Carrow!" replied the old man, mournfully; "but India."

"India!" repeated the baronet, in a tone of disappointment and surprise.

"Yes. I have paid the debt to honour and to justice!" resumed the old man; "the debt due to gratitude and friendship still remains! The widowed mother of Meeran Hafaz must learn from my lips that she is a childless woman! Her husband was my benefactor—my friend—need I say more? Do we part in peace?"

"In peace!" exclaimed Sir William, extending his hand; "more—we part as friends. In the circumstances fortune placed you in, many would have consulted their own interest and safety, rather than the eternal principles of justice and truth. Whenever my thoughts revert to you," he added, "they will be kindly ones!"

"Thanks!" said the renegade, deeply moved.

"Can I do nothing for you—nothing to prove my esteem—my gratitude?"

"Nothing!" was the calm reply; "you have removed the last reproach from my heart! As for worldly means, I am rich—rich even to loathing. Think not my design," he continued, "ill-considered or unkind—my brother already knows and approves it! Farewell! Be as happy as you merit—and I can wish you no greater recompense!"

Raising the hand which he still retained in his to his lips, he left the room; and before the baronet could recover from his surprise, the rattle of the chaise past the windows told him that he was already beyond recall.

Neither Sir William nor his brother ever heard of or from him afterwards.

The next day, according to arrangement, the party started for Carrow.

Far different was the reception of Sir William and his widowed mother on the present occasion, from his tenantry and friends, to the one they experienced on their first arrival. Then respect and sympathy for their long-suffering lady kept them silent, and the claims of their young landlord were unknown; but now their joy was unbroken. A large body of tenants on horseback met them several miles from the common, to escort them to the abbey. A hearty, joyous shout broke from them as the carriages appeared in sight, mingled with cries of "Long live Sir William Mowbray!" "Long live the heir of Carrow!"

"Long live Mister Beans!" roared Red Ralph—who, mounted upon a colt as rugged and shaggy as himself, had joined in the procession.

Knowing how faithfully he had served his young master, the farmers responded to it with a hearty cheer, which increased rather than lessened the embarrassment of poor Joe—who consoled himself by mentally promising to pull the ears of the little urchin, whose exuberant gratitude had drawn such unlooked-for attention upon him: which resolution, we are happy to say, the events of the day caused the honest rustic to forget.

"Where are the farmer and his wife?" demanded our hero, of Chettleborough, the sexton, who was one of the foremost of the crowd.

"At the abbey, Sir William!" replied the old man, delighted at being the first person whom the baronet addressed.

"Right!" said the young man, with a smile; "they have but anticipated my wish!"

As the procession moved on, the crowd increased. The entire population of the village was gathered round the park-gates, which opened wide to receive them.

Farmer Ashton and his dame, together with Jarmy and the old servants, were assembled under the old porch.

No sooner had he alighted, than Sir William shook the armer by the hand, and kissed his wife upon the cheek, which was stained with tears of joy and gratified affection. Taking them by the hand, he led them, despite their resistance, into the drawing-room, where his mother, Ellen, the duchess, and Dr. Orme had already preceded them.

"No—no, Harry—Sir William, I mean!" faltered the old woman; "the housekeeper's room is quite good enough for us!"

The baronet, however, had his way, and the quiet kindness of Lady Mowbray and her friends soon put the worthy couple at their ease.

The rejoicings were continued to a late hour, and the bonfire on the common, which Ralph and a troop of boys about his own age took under their immediate superintendence, was for many a day the talk of Carrow.

"Uncle," said Sir William, who had called upon

Matthew Ashton and his wife, "I have two favours to ask of you." He knew the best way to gratify him was to use the old familiar words.

"Of me!" exclaimed the old man, delighted.

"You must not refuse me!"

"Refuse you!" repeated the dame; "well, I should like to hear him refuse you anything! If he does, Harry—Sir William, I mean," she added, correcting herself, "only say 'I will,' and farmer will give in."

"I may not do that!" replied our hero, with a smile; "what I wish is, that you should give up the Home Farm to Joe Beans, who is to be married to Susan."

"Give up the Home Farm! Bless me! Yes—if you really wish it!"

"I do wish it!"

"But where are dame and I to live?"

"With your son, to be sure!" said the baronet, taking the old man by the hand. "We must not be separated, and as I cannot conveniently come and live with you, the next best thing is for you to take up your abode with me! My mother and Ellen," he added, seeing that the old couple hesitated, "both wish it, and I shall not be happy without it."

A request so pressed it was impossible to refuse. Their adopted son, in making it, had hit on the only means of repaying the care and affection they had lavished upon his youth. Wealth they required not—for, as the dame frequently used to boast, "they were rich, and it wor all for Harry!"

It was instantly agreed that the farm should be given up.

"But these said two favours, Sir William?" said the farmer, vainly striving to conceal his tears; "this be one to me and dame."

"Not less than to myself!" observed the young man, kindly; "but the next is not exactly my request, although I most heartily join in it—it is from Ellen."

"Lor!" exclaimed the dame; "what can farmer do to serve Miss Ellen? So rich, and beautiful, and happy!"

"We are about—but remember this is a great secret," said their visitor, with a smile—for he knew how little chance there was of its being kept—"to be married! Now Ellen is an orphan. The rector will perform the ceremony, and the bride wishes the farmer to give her away."

"What, I?"

"Matthew stand father to Miss Ellen!"

"From whom better can I receive my wife, than from him, who has acted as a father by me?" replied the baronet.

It were needless to say that the second favour was granted, even more readily than the first; and their visitor departed, leaving the hearts of those who had watched over his infant years overflowing with gratitude and affection.

"He be our own boy, dame, after all!" exclaimed the delighted farmer; "at least I love him as dearly as if he had been our own."

"I am sure I do, Matthew!" replied his wife, wiping her eyes; "only think—to live at the abbey!"

"Hang the abbey! It isn't that I care about—it's living with Harry—Harry again! But I can't help it—it do come so natural, loike! But, dame," he added, seriously, "we mustn't abuse his goodness—mustn't feel that we are a tie upon him. So, when the gentry come to visit him, we'll just keep to the housekeeper's room. Mrs. Jarmy will be company for thee, and I'll smoke my pipe wi' butler."

"Humph!" muttered his wife, who did not exactly see the necessity of the proposed arrangement, into which, however, she naturally fell after the first few days; confessing that she should pine herself to death, if forced to sit with her hands before her in the drawing-room.

Besides, she was still looking after things for her dear boy Harry—as she invariably called the baronet, when speaking of him in confidence to her husband or Mrs. Jarmy.

The morning at last dawned which was to reward the manly virtue of Sir William and the long-sufferings of Ellen. Although an attempt had been made to conceal from the tenantry the exact day, yet somehow the secret got whispered; and great was the devastation committed in consequence, not only in the garden of the rectory, but in those of the neighbouring farmers. The entire church was decorated with flowers, and the secluded path which led from the park to the sacred edifice decked with evergreens.

The baronet and Ellen were married first—then Joe Beans and Susan.

Farmer Ashton's affection, and the pride of his wife, were amply gratified; for their adopted son received from the hands of the former the band of the fair orphan.

As the carriage containing the newly-wedded pair drove from the porch of the old abbey, a hearty shout was given by the crowd which thronged the lawn, and many a prayer was breathed for their happiness.

And they were happy—happy as a life of usefulness and love could make them. Sir William dispensed the fortune he had so unexpectedly inherited in promoting the welfare of all around. The farmer and his wife resided with him to the last—the contentment of the good dame receiving its completion at being requested to stand godmother to the baronet's second son, who received the name of Harry.

The Home Farm, too, prospered in the hands of honest Joe and his industrious little wife, who were frequent visitors at Carrow. The only occasion on which he neglected his work, was when he heard the report of Sir William's gun in the preserves: then, despite the pouting of the pretty Susan, and her hints about plunging and harrowing, the sturdy yeoman would sally forth to join his dear young master—he had always a fresh covey of birds to show him.

As time rolled on, these little interruptions became of less consequence—for Red Ralph, who remained with him, became fully competent to supply his place in the fields and farm-yard. Under the instruction of Susan, he gradually lost much of his uncouth manners, and married an industrious girl, the daughter of a small farmer—who, quite as much to his own astonishment as that of every one else, took a violent fancy to him.

As Ralph used to say, when sitting by the hearth of his own cottage—a gift from the baronet and his lady:

"It wor a happy day for I, when I first met Mister Beans!"

The duchess, soon after the marriage of our hero, returned to Italy; but the widowed Lady Mowbray remained with her children—blessed, after so many cruel trials, in the contemplation of their happiness, which reflected back, as in a mirror, the dreams of her own youth.

Our task is ended, and yet the pen will linger in our hand. But we must not abuse the sympathy of our readers by longer delaying them. One moral at least we trust they have gleaned from our tale—namely, that it is not sufficient for any of the great purposes of life to possess, like Meeran, the "Will" alone; as the happy husband of Ellen proved, honour, integrity, and truth must find the "Way."

[END OF "THE WILL AND THE WAY."]

LADY HATTON.

In this huge London there is one spot, nearly in its centre, into which many close-alleys, and crowded courts, and narrow lanes, and long passages, and murky yards daily pour out a rush of population, like the arteries sending life-blood to the human heart. Not one of those places but has some sad memory associated with it—some story of sin or sorrow, of silent suffering, or of deep crime. Many such places are there within the space which we call Holborn. A populous world is that long street, with its continuous line of busy traffic—its hum of many voices—like the murmur of the angry waves when they dash into white froth and tawny spume upon a rocky coast. But it was not always thus. There was a time when it was a houseless space, where the citizens of London met for sports, the very names of which have passed away, like the memories of those who practised them. Afterwards, one of the kings who held sway in London inclosed these city meadows with a wall, and bestowed them as a gift upon some cunning courtier, who had found his way to the royal heart by flattery. Next, when king and courtier had passed away, the fair fields came into the possession of a brave old soldier, who had won fortune and fame in the wars with France.

This was the Lord Hatton. He built in the centre of this estate a grand chateau, like what he had seen abroad. He had a gardener from the Low Countries, to lay out for him a beautiful place, with terraces and fountains, winding walks and green swards, fruit-trees and flowers, quaint sculptures in stone, and curious devices, fancifully cut out of the trees which grew there. There also were grottoes of spars and shells, which gleamed like precious stones when viewed by torch-light. And, in gilded cages—as if splendour could diminish the pain of captivity—were rare birds from lands far beyond the sea. The palace and the pleasure-grounds are gone—the most searching antiquarian would fail to find a trace of them. But the place which we now know as Hatton Garden shows where they once were. They were the marvel of their day, and their owner was so proud of them that it would be hard to say which he cared more for—them, or the fair youth, his only son. Well and tenderly, piously and fondly, he had brought up this youth. In time, however, the old lord died, and the dwelling and the garden, the jewels and the gold, the honours and the title descended to his son.

There was a gorgeous funeral, and the king attended it, with all his court. The young Lord Hatton wanted some months of being of age, but preparations soon began to be made for the rejoicings. They ransacked foreign lands for whatever was rare and costliest, to celebrate his twenty-first birthday. They brought arras from the tapestry-makers of Artois, and fine linen from the looms of Flanders, and rich wines from the valleys of Burgundy, and cloth of gold from the storehouses of Genoa, and tall mirrors from the island manufactories of Venice, and spices from the fragrant groves of Arabia, and transparent tissues from the labour of the dusky dwellers in India, and royal carpets from the merchants of Persia, and gold and silver plate, rich with chased adornments, from the goldsmiths of Paris and the carvers of Florence. For the Lord Hatton had succeeded to wealth capable of answering almost the utmost demands of extravagance, and he had resolved that his coming to man's estate should be celebrated in no niggard manner.

The gala-day arrived. The King himself was among the earliest guests, anxious to judge for himself, whether Rumour had exaggerated the fortune and luxurious tastes of his wealthy subject. The magnificence of that day was never to be forgotten by those who saw it. Far and near, it was spoken of as eclipsing even the most royal splendour. The poets of the day made many a ballad about it, which for a long time were sung in rich men's palaces and poor men's lowly dwellings. Rich wines spouted from the fountains, from dawn of day to the set of sun. There were refreshments laid out in tents, including the substantial fare which men liked then, as well as delicate luxuries culled from many a distant clime. There were crowds of servitors inviting, pressing all to partake of the rich viands and the sparkling wines. There was sweet music from skilful players, concealed among the leafy shrubberies. There was a long portion of the green sward pressed down and closely mown, on which the youths and maidens might dance. There was a field-at-arms for the bold knights who attended the festival. There was an extensive range in which the yeomen might exercise their sports. There was something to suit the taste and rank of all, rich and poor, old and young, gentle and simple.

The place was thrown open to all who pleased to visit it, as well as to the distinguished specially invited by the Lord Hatton. Among the lovely visitors was one who had more beauty than the brightest of the fair ones present. She was very lovely indeed, and exceedingly proud in the consciousness of that surpassing beauty. She was among the crowd, not of it. Her father was an humble, honest man, earning a hard living by hard labour. She was discontented with her lot in life. Many gallants of the Court, who had noted her remarkable beauty, had attempted to draw her from her father's humble roof: pride, rather than principle, had as yet prevented her fall. She was heart-sick with discontent. There was this aggravation also—she had been educated above her station. Adjacent to her father's cottage, close to what we now call St. Martin's Lane, there was a convent, where she had been taught to read and write—unusual attainments, at that time, for one of her age and sex—and increase of knowledge had been as fuel to feed the flame of discontent which was swelling in her heart. She was thus exactly ripe for temptation. Be sure that the Evil One ever watches the hour and seizes the occasion to do his will.

It would be difficult to determine what impulse had brought Edith Lee—for that was her name—to the great festival given on Lord Hatton's birthday. It is true that most of her neighbours went, but theirs was no example for one who ever had scorned to follow in the common track, and had hitherto avoided exhibitions of grandeur; for when they were over, it made her very sad to think, as she sat in the poor cottage of her father, that others should be splendidly attired and luxuriously surrounded, while she was subject to the lowest wants, yet feeling that her capacity for enjoyment was as high as theirs. Surely she had not gone among the crowd at Lord Hatton's to display her beauty—she was too proud to be vain—for she had half-hidden her face beneath the large wimple which she wore, according to the custom of her humble condition in those days, and had concealed her figure in her ordinary plain attire. A mixture of curiosity and impatience had brought her thither. If she had endeavoured to define the impulse, she might have failed. There are times and circumstances which lead us to act, we know not why, as if some viewless finger of resistless fate beckoned us on, and impelled us to obedience.

As Edith Lee stood, pale and still as a Sibyl, in that scene of gaiety and mirth, perhaps her bosom was the only one in the crowd which covered a heavy heart. Naturally of a temperament more lively than grave, her musings had turned of late into that thoughtful meditation from which tears would be a great relief, but to calm which tears do rarely flow. Her beauty gained more in expression than it lost in force by this change. The light of her glance was not dimmed but softened, and her voice now had a subdued sweetness, like that born of the gentle kiss of the southern breeze upon the voiceful chords of the Æolian harp. She now bore a deeper beauty than that of common life—a beauty over which Thought had gently passed, and softly left a trace of its shadowy presence. So, in the world's elder days, might have appeared a daughter of earth, after her first entrancing interview with one of the Sons of God, earthward descended, enamoured of her beauty; and so might she have stood in listening mood, after having gazed at the purple pinions of the heavenly visitant on his returning flight, thinking that, after the visible Presence had passed away, she yet heard the rustling sounds of those ether-cleaving wings, and wondering whether she should ever again bask in the light of the radiant countenance which beamed with glory from the far and golden empyreal!

Thus Edith Lee stood, almost concealed in the shadow and by the huge trunk of an ancient tree—her mind far away in the land of dreams, as she gazed upon the changing brilliancies of the sky, fancying each cloud an island in which it would be happiness to live and love. Who among us has not watched the sky, when its blue beauty is diversified with glorious piles of many-coloured cloud, in which Fancy can trace islets, domes, minarets, and mountains, blended yet contrasted? Who has not sometimes yielded to the softening influences of the subduing even-tide, and, gazing on this glorious Cloudland, wished that he had wings to fly away and be at rest among one of its many mansions? So stood and gazed Edith Lee, and so she thought, until there came the sweet voice of music, and the sound of approaching footsteps, and the happy harmony of light laughter, and the joyful murmur of mirthful language. There was one voice, among the many that were audible, which thrilled through her very heart. It was musical, clear, and low as the pleasant sound of a well-played instrument. As the crowd of gallants came in view, she recognised one face, one form, the moment she saw it—a recognition which, though none but herself was or could be aware of it, caused a heartquake which covered her brow, cheeks, neck, and bosom with a sudden flush. Voice, form, and face were such as, night after night, had haunted her in dreams, ever since her proud spirit had rebelled against her lowly condition in life. Have I not said that the Tempter had marked that discontent?

Never before, never before had she thus seen him—breathing, living, speaking in her presence. But he had been vividly with her in the dream by night, and, though less distinctly, in her waking thoughts by day. Her heart had been filled with new and deep sensations—so powerful that the blessed daylight sometimes became wearisome to her, and she longed for night, because then again she should behold this spirit-love of hers. So overpowering was this new sense, thus strangely operating, that often, in the clear noon-day, she would shut her eyes, in the hope that in this semblance of sleep, when external objects were shut out, she would palpably arise before the vision of her mind. And it was a strange and strong peculiarity in this life-in-sleep, that while in dreams she traced and passed through a successive series of adventures with this creation of her fancy, her waking thoughts had but a vague and uncertain impression of him and them. Now she saw him—speaking, smiling, walking proudly amid a group of gallant gentlemen—as glorious as ever he had appeared in the fair and boundless world of sleep.

The crowd of gallants passed on—Lord Hatton in the midst—and Edith Lee remained leaning against the old tree, straining her sight after them long after they had gone beyond her view. She did not heed his companions. She had not noted how many nor how few they were, or what their appearance. She only felt that she had seen him—that he was a creature of life like herself, and that his evident rank removed him from her by a gulf which she could not pass.

Edith Lee's mind was so much the prey of these conflicting emotions, that she did not note how long she remained by the old tree. After a time, she became aware that somebody was standing opposite to her, carefully reading her features. She saw a middle-aged man, well-dressed, and dark-featured, with a countenance such as you could not give a plausible reason for not liking, and yet its expression such as one does not like to look upon. There was a sneer upon his thin, pale lips, and a sardonic gleaming in his glance, which, as their eyes met, made her feel uncomfortable. She would fain have moved from him—for his glance troubled her; but it seemed as if she had lost all power of voluntary motion and speech. He held her there with his glittering eyes, as the serpent fixes the wild birds in the depths of the Indian woods. He laid his hand upon hers, and the touch, light as it was, thrilled to the bone, and chilled her blood.

He spoke to her. His voice, though not unmusical in itself, grated harshly on her ear. He spoke in a tone low enough for a whisper, yet every syllable fell distinctly upon her ear, and sank into her heart.

"You soar high, lady-bird!" said he. "It is a bold dove to seek a mate in the eagle's eyrie! You love that gay young lord—you would wed him?" He bent his face close to hers, as he added, "and you shall!"

She shrank back from him with unconcealed dislike, and the expression of his features became terrible in its demoniac beauty.

"What, pretty one," he continued, "you shrink from your friend, who has the power and the will to remove the cottage flower, and place it in the glory of the palace-gardens! Why, trembler? I have known your wishes—I have fashioned your dreams, until sleep has become for you a life more beautiful than any reality you have yet known! Your heart rebelled against the lowly state in which you are placed, and that rebellious discontent gave me power over you! Lo! now you shrink from my words, and you never shrink from my works! You even stand upon ground which is my own! Your foot rests upon the grave of a suicide. You need not start! By his pride of heart he killed his mother! He stained a name which never, until then, had been tarnished by the breath of dishonour. He betrayed his country, denied his God, and came back a broken man, to hang himself from the very tree you lean against! In childhood's innocence he had played beneath its shade, and the huge branch that bore his quivering body withered from that hour! See, it hangs above you, leafless and barkless!"

Edith Lee heard the words of mockery, and her spirit quailed beneath the scowl of that dark and mysterious man. She fell in a heavy faint, yet heard a whisper in the air:

"If you would wed this young lord, meet me, at midnight, in the churchyard by St. Martin's monastery!"

It was dusk when she awoke. She left Lord Hatton's garden, unnoticed amid the crowd, and sought the solitude of her own little chamber. Here she thought upon what had passed, and shuddered as she thought. Then she wept, and tears relieved her. Then she knelt down and prayed. That night her slumbers were peaceful as the repose of an infant.

But the morrow came, bringing back the old discontent which had vexed her spirit, together with new and stirring desires, which the sight of Lord Hatton had excited. Day after day sped on, and there was an end now to the bright dreams which had made night so longed for. The very lack of these sweet visions made her day-thoughts turn upon their living object. As she often saw him pass her door now—sometimes on foot, sometimes on horseback—always superior to his companions, and never bestowing upon her even the scanty homage of a transient glance, she was in no chance of forgetting him.

Weeks thus passed on. Then came the rumour that the young Lord Hatton was about to wed a royal ward. The news unvaried Edith Lee. That night she did not pray. So the Tempter resumed his power over her, and she dreamed that she saw a bridal throng, and that she stood at the altar, with Lord Hatton as the bridegroom. Then she awoke, and the moonlight glancing coldly in through the dull and narrow casement, dimly revealed the squalid poverty of her chamber. And then, once again, clear and low came the remembered whisper:

"If you would wed this young lord, meet me at midnight, in the churchyard of Saint Martin's monastery."

She started from her bed, for the hour was at hand. She wound up the contention between the evil spirit and the better angel in her heart, by resolving to try whether the Stranger would, indeed, be at the rendezvous. No necessity, she thought in her pride, for compliance with his demands, should he make any—and she deemed—foolish girl!—that he might be able, perhaps, to unfold or influence her future.

It was not difficult to leave her father's cottage, for Poverty has occasion for few bars and bolts. She stole out, with noiseless steps. She came back in an hour, with pale cheeks, and wild eyes, and a throbbing brow. Whom she met, what passed, what pledges she received, what promises she returned, none ever knew; but it was said, in after times, that she had signed a contract—signed it with a pen dipped in her own blood—with the Great Enemy, to give herself to him, body and soul, at a future day, if he would procure her marriage with Lord Hatton. She returned to her bed. She could not pray now.

Next day, as Edith Lee was standing at her father's door, a noble company of gallants rode by. One of them, the chief, bent low to the beauty of Edith Lee, cap in hand, until his forehead touched the mane of his Barbary charger. That evening, and often after, he came to the cottage, unattended and disguised, vainly striving to gain the favour of Edith Lee—for the cunning of her sex taught her how coyness wins better than submission. That day month, to the wonder of all, Edith Lee became the bride of the Lord Hatton.

Who ought now to have been half so happy as Edith Lady Hatton? Her beauty was so exquisite that even the ladies of the Court admitted it to be scarcely wonderful that she wore the coronet so many had contended for. As if intuitively, she immediately assumed the manner of her new and exalted station, becoming it as if she had been born to it. All hearts admired, all eyes followed her. The breath of scandal never approached her. She was a faithful and a loving wife. She was the idol of her husband, who thought nothing that wealth could procure half good enough for her. So liberal was she in her largess to the poor, that wherever she went their gratitude loudly poured out prayers for blessings on her head. Yet, with all her beauty, state, and wealth, Edith Lee was not happy. One fatal remembrance cast its shadow upon her path.

In due time, an heir was born to her noble lord. Then the shadow upon Edith's brow appeared less dark, and her eyes lost some of the troubled expression, which it sometimes had grieved her loving husband to look upon. Now, more than ever, she gave great aims to the poor; but, even in the West Minster, to which she sometimes resorted with her husband and her household, neither her heart nor her lips were moved with prayer. Something heavy was upon her mind, forbidding her to pour out her troubled spirit before her Maker. But her aims to the poor were constant and ample, her gifts to the religious houses were great: and hence it appeared that the common voice spoke loudly of her piety, shown through her works—as if Charity could atone for the lack of Faith. Yet, oftentimes, persons profess to believe, never showing that belief by their actions towards their fellow-men—as if Faith could atone for the lack of Charity! It is then the casket without the jewel.

As years rolled on, Edith Lady Hatton appeared of lighter and livelier mood. For the most part, she now thought of the past as of an unpleasant memory, which might best be cast into forgetfulness. But there were times when she had awful forebodings, and terrible fears, and dread despair; when her eyes would have a fixed and stony glare, as if they saw in vacancy that which they hated to behold, yet could not avoid—when the bloom of beauty would leave the face, and an unnatural paleness succeed—when her lips would try to utter faint and hurried words of awe and supplication—when all the living, breathing world around her, would seem as nothing before the compelling power of that dreadful Presence, invisible to all but her! At last, when a passion of tears had relieved her, she would anxiously inquire what she had spoken, and whether they could glean meaning from her words; and then would she hide her face in her husband's bosom, and wonder at herself, or affect to wonder, for being so weak and womanly.

She had but the one child, a boy of great promise, who was barely fifteen when her husband died. She bestowed great care upon his education, and had him brought up in the fear and love of God. For herself, she now frequented the minster more than ever. She was constant at matins and vespers; but she never knelt in the confessional; she prayed no prayer to God for pardon and succour. It seemed to her that she was secure from her enemy in the house of God—though even there she could pour forth no supplication for His grace, either in spoken words or spiritual thought.

The youth rose to manhood, as his father had done, and Edith made ample preparation for celebrating his twenty-first birthday.

Who can describe all the splendour of that brilliant festival?—the smiles and the glitter, and the beauty of the glare! The choicest of the company assembled in a stately saloon, which extended the whole length of Hatton House. At the top of this saloon was a chair of state for the Lady Hatton, who seemed almost as beautiful as in her early days of youth and maidenhood. Who so proud as that fond mother, looking lovingly upon her graceful and gallant son?

Upon the verge of midnight—the latest time, according to the etiquette of that epoch, to which the festivities could decorously be continued—the young Lord Hatton went to his mother, and entreated her to dance the last measure with him, and thus wind up a celebration which, he said, his heart could never forget. And, as he spoke, he took her hand in his, and pleasant tears filled his mother's eyes, as she looked upon him, and drank in the music of his low and earnest voice—soft and low in its gentle pleading. For, as she looked and listened, there came before her the dreams of her youth, and their glad fulfilment; and she joyed to see by her side such a fair image of that father whom she had loved with a love which seemed as if it were indeed a portion of her very life.

The Lady Hatton smiled upon her son through her pleasant tears, as she told him that years had taken away the buoyancy of her spirit and of her motion; that she was loth to refuse him anything upon that happy day, and that she would even join with him in the dance, if he could not find a more suitable partner. As she spoke, she looked round upon the bright company of ladies who were present; but her son said, with a smile, that in truth he had already danced with every other lady in the room: so that she had no further pretence for declining to gratify him. Then he led her to her place.

The dance was renewed, and the Lady Hatton and her son stood at the end of the saloon, that they might close the festival by treading the last measure. Merrily sounded the music. Mirth filled all hearts, and flashed from every eye, and spoke from many a lip. Thus all went on pleasantly—even noisily, perhaps—until now was almost time for the lady and her son to lead off the merry galliard, and with it conclude that joyous festival.

Hark! a loud crash at the outer door, as if a hundred rude hands were loudly striking upon it at once! A sudden pause in the music and the dance! A silence, as if a voice of command had sounded through the room—"Speak no more!"

Men looked inquiringly into each other's faces, as if to learn what could cause this strange noise at such an hour. Women stood, with pale faces and anxious eyes, in utter fear and wonderment. And then, after a minute's pause, all smiled at the interruption, and renewed the dance.

Presently an attendant glided in, almost unperceived; but the Lady Hatton saw his quivering lips, white cheeks, and frightened eyes. He told her, in awed and broken words, so low that no ear but hers could hear, that they had opened the door to a Stranger, who demanded instant audience with her. The lady sent back for answer (but her heart sank within her as she spoke), that he must be told this was neither time nor place for any but invited guests.

The attendant speeded to deliver this message, but quickly came back with a more terror-stricken countenance than before, to say that He would take no denial, for his second and more imperative message was, that "there was One below who must have instant parley with the Lady, and his token was—their last meeting in the churchyard, by St. Martin's Monastery."

Paler grew the Lady's cheek as she heard this second message. There are times when the thoughts and the fears, the anxieties and the remorse, the pains and the regrets, the griefs and the despair of a lifetime, can crowd upon the heart in one brief moment of intensest agony. Such a moment was that in which the Lady Hatton's mind—awed, unnerved, horror-stricken—was rent by pangs such as never can be described. She grasped the chair which stood near her, and endeavoured to steady herself by its support. The room seemed to swim around her. Strange sights glanced before her eyes. Strange voices made unearthly sounds for her ears. But this bewilderment was brief, and her mind soon cleared, the terrible consciousness remaining, in fullest reality, that dreadful evil was about to befall her.

Meanwhile the merry dance went on. It seemed as if no one had noticed the alteration which, in little more than a minute, had taken place in the aspect of the Lady Hatton. Her cheeks were pale as marble; her eyes were dulled into a fixed and death-like stare; her lips had lost all colour; her frame was shaken with emotion. Her son, who stood a little behind her, was speaking gaily to a smiling maiden, with whom he had danced earlier in the evening, and, thus occupied, he did not observe, and could not note, the strong heart-quake of emotion which so greatly agitated his mother.

A heavy tramp of feet upon the stairs; yet no ear heard it except hers. The door was burst open, as if a mighty whirlwind had dashed it in. No one noticed it, and the dance went blithely on. A tall figure advanced to the Lady Hatton. Her cry of terror was stifled in her throat. The well-remembered glittering eyes were upon her, with their demoniac leer. She had now lost all power over herself, but retained consciousness and sensation. The dark Stranger, with a smile of mock courtesy which iced her life-blood, took her jewelled hand, and led her forth to dance. Then, for the first time, the guests noticed his presence. A thick yellow cloud gradually filled the room, and, as its density increased, the pestilential vapour blinded the eyes, and rendered difficult the breathing of all.

When the cloud dispersed, in a few minutes, all looked on the Lady Hatton. But none could see her in the room. Her chair was crashed into many fragments. The carcanet which she had worn around her neck was found, shattered, on the floor. Of herself there was no further trace—but the attendant who had announced the fearful Stranger, declared that he had seen him lead her forth to dance, that he had whirled her round and round with resistless force, and that thus they had glided out of the saloon together.

In the midst of the wonderment, while they were yet listening to the broken sentences of the attendant, there suddenly arose a dreadful confusion in the disquieted air. High and shrill was heard a piercing shriek of bodily anguish. Then came unearthly laughter, as of a demon; and thus yell followed yell, while wild laughter, the dreadful merriment and mockery of a fiend, alternated with woman's shrieks of hopeless agony and dread despair. After a time all again was silence. Then, as with a sudden and simultaneous impulse, the guests rushed out of the house in a body. The young Lord Hatton, who had fallen into a swoon, was attended by skilful physicians, but many days elapsed before he awoke to consciousness.

In a remote part of Hatton Garden (beneath the very tree which shaded the grave of the suicide, where Edith Lee had first seen Lord Hatton, and by which the Evil One had first spoken to her), were found, the day after the festival, one lock of long, dark, silky hair, and a human heart rent in twain and bleeding. Fragments of flesh were found in various parts of that extensive garden, as if, indeed, a human being had been torn to pieces in the air, and scattered piecemeal on the earth. But it was beneath the old tree, and upon the mound which covered the unhallowed dust of the suicide, that the Bleeding Heart was found.

The young Lord Hatton, struck with awe at the terrible event, never more took his wonted place in the world. He became a brother of the Cistercian order of St. Martin, and gave his estates for the benefit of the monastery, on the condition that they gave a perpetual mass for the repose of his unhappy mother's soul. After a time, these estates were sold. The mansion was demolished, for none were willing to reside in it—the popular belief being, that at certain times, strange scenes were re-enacted within its walls. As the city increased, the land was built upon, and one portion, now a populous street, retaining the familiar name of all, is called Hatton Garden to this day. Even yet (although the particulars of the story have nearly fallen out of memory), the place where the heart of the Lady Hatton was found, bears the name of BLEEDING-HEART YARD.

VEGETABLE DIET.—An animal diet, especially in temperate climates, is more wasting than a vegetable, because it excites, by its stimulating qualities, a fever after every meal, by which the springs of life are urged into constant and weakening exertions; on the contrary, a vegetable diet tends to preserve a delicacy of feeling, a liveliness of imagination, and an acuteness of judgment seldom enjoyed by those who live principally on meat.

NAILS GROWING INTO THE FLESH.—A late writer in the Ohio Cultivator, gives the following remedy: "Cut a notch in the middle of the nail every time the nail is pared. The disposition to close the notch draws the nail up from the sides. It cured mine after I had suffered weeks with its festering."

THE OLD MOON IN THE NEW MOON'S ARMS.—It has been stated that the moon is invisible when out of sunshine. This is strictly true, although a word of explanation may be needed to prove the fact. Often, within a day or two of the time of new moon, the dull surface of its body may be seen faintly traced out on the twilight sky. Not only the crescent of the shining portion is visible—the entire face of the hemisphere turned towards the earth is also obscurely perceptible. The old moon lies, as it is said, within the arms of the new. Now the light by which the old moon makes its appearance under these circumstances, is really sunshine, notwithstanding the position the solar orb holds beyond the lunar sphere; but it is twice-diluted sunshine—the silver has been transmuted into lead by the touch of earth. The sun-light does not penetrate through the moon's substance, but comes to the earth, is thence thrown back to the moon, and from the moon returns to earth again. At the time of new moon, the earth, it will be remembered, is on the opposite side of the moon to the sun; consequently, the illumined half of the earth is shining on the moon, and the leaden hue we perceive is the moon seen by the earth-shine. This earth-shine is thirteen times stronger to the moon than the moonshine is to us, on account of the comparatively larger dimensions of the terrestrial sphere. Some astronomers state that this earth-shine on the moon changes its ash-grey tint into a green one, when the part of the earth opposite to the new moon is that which contains the verdant and forest-covered plains of South America. There can be no doubt that this earth-shine on the moon is more vivid when the terrestrial atmosphere through which it has to pass is clear, and that it is made dull when that air is laden with clouds and mists. Arago believes that we shall, some time or other, be able to ascertain the mean state of our atmosphere's transparency, by watching the ashy tints that appear on the obscure portion of the moon.

HOW TO GET HONEY FROM BEES WITHOUT SMOKING.—Mr. McLeod, head gardener at Altyre, has introduced a system in the management of bees into this part of the country, which bids fair to supersede entirely the long-practised plan of smoking hives at the end of harvest, and destroying the bees. Mr. M. has succeeded in obtaining a larger quantity of honey from a given number of hives, and of better quality than ordinary, without the loss of any of the bees. The multiplying process, too, goes on as uninterruptedly as under the old mode. In one week, a short time since, there were no fewer than six top swarms added to the former number of stools. Mr. M. uses various shapes and kinds of hive. One, which may be regarded as a model, made from one seen by Lady Gordon Cumming in the Great Exhibition—is of wood, painted green, and of a cottage shape. It has glass panes in different parts, through which, on removing a shutter, the bees may be seen working. At the upper part behind, a hinged board opens and shows six bell glasses, which hold about three pounds of honey each. The bees have access to these glasses through a small aperture in the board over which they are set, and as the honey is deposited here first, the bees work downwards, and when the glasses are full, they can be removed and emptied at pleasure. When they are replaced, a fresh supply of honey is again deposited. Although this process goes on so as to leave the hive very little for winter provision, Mr. M. says he never had occasion to feed the bees. He assured as of the seemingly anomalous fact, that the larger the hive and the greater number of bees, the less sustenance through the winter do they require. The same process, slightly varied, goes on with the other ordinary skeps. There is a small hole made in the top of the straw hive, on which a lath box, eight inches and a half square and six inches deep, with a bit of window glass in front, is set. When this box, which will contain about fourteen pounds of honey, is full, it is removed and emptied, and filled a second time. Twenty-eight pounds, and sometimes thirty-two pounds, of the finest virgin honey may be thus abstracted from a hive in a season, still leaving as much in the body of the skep as will be sufficient maintenance for the bees through the winter. Smaller hives have smaller boxes; the quantity of honey taken of course is proportioned to the strength of the hive. Every precaution is adopted by facilities for observation, that no abstraction of honey, beyond what the industrious communities can afford, takes place.

DAGUERRE.—Dumas says, that while a lecturer on Chemistry, in the Theatre de Sorbonne sometime in 1825, he was accosted by a lady, at the close of one of his discourses, who anxiously inquired: "Monsieur Dumas, as a man of science, I have a question of no small moment to me to ask you. I am the wife of Daguerre, the painter. For some time he has let the idea seize upon him that he can fix the image of the camera. Do you think it possible? He is always at the thought; he can't sleep at night for it. I am afraid he is out of his mind. Do you, as a man of science, think it can ever be done, or is he mad?" "In the present state of knowledge," said Dumas, "it cannot be done; but I cannot say it will always remain impossible, nor set the man down as mad who seeks to do it." This was twelve years before Daguerre worked his idea out, and fixed the images; but many a man so haunted by a possibility has been tormented into a madhouse.

CURE FOR HYDROPHOBIA.—Half a dozen specifics for its cure have been given to the public from time to time, yet we do not remember that one single case of confirmed rabies has ever been cured within the last dozen years. Still, we are confident that, in the Providence of God, there is for every bane an antidote, and it becomes men to "prove all things" until the remedy for hydrophobia shall have been discovered and universally made known. A correspondent of the National Era writes from Milbury, Massachusetts, as follows: "I am now in my eightieth year, and have obtained what information I could, both from observation and critical study. It has lately been discovered that a strong decoction made of the bark of the roots of the white ash, when drunk as medicine, will cure the bite of a mad dog. This, undoubtedly, is owing to the fact that rattlesnakes can be made more easily to crawl over live fire-coals than white ash-leaves; and they are never found in the forest where the white ash grows. Would it not be advisable for druggists in our large towns and cities to keep constantly on hand a medicine prepared from the roots of the white ash? It might be the means of saving some valuable lives from a sudden and painful death."—American Paper.

TELEGRAPHIC PROGRESS.—Arrangements are said to be actually in progress for laying down a submarine telegraph between the United Kingdom and America. It is intended to connect the two countries, or rather the Old and New Worlds, through Galway and Halifax, the two nearest points of communication. The distance is about 1600 miles. The practicability of the scheme has been guaranteed, it is said, by nearly all the eminent engineers of the day, and various firms have sent in estimates for the execution of the work. These estimates vary from £800,000 down to £300,000, and some of the lowest estimates are said to have been sent in by some of the most respectable firms in the country.

COTTON ROPES FOR SHIPS.—There is a novelty about the Sovereign of the Seas that doubtless will be soon imitated by other vessels. The ropes which form the running rigging are of cotton, which we understand is not only capable of a tighter twist, but is not liable to become deteriorated by friction in the same degree as hempen cords. After they have been in use, too, for years, they can be sold for nearly as much as the original cost. These ropes are quite smooth, and run with great rapidity through the blocks. The sails also of this vessel are of cotton, two sets of cotton sails costing only the sum paid for one set of linen.—Liverpool Times.

A very interesting Parliamentary return respecting the Post Office has appeared, from which we cull a few facts illustrating the gigantic advance of the system. In the year 1839, the estimated number of chargeable letters and franks which passed through the post offices of the United Kingdom was 82,470,596. The next year the total was doubled; and it has constantly increased, till, in 1852, the aggregate had swelled to 379,501,499. For the year ending 5th January, 1840, the gross revenue was £2,390,763; the net, £1,589,486. On the reduction of the postage there was a great falling off; but in the year ending 5th January, 1853, the gross revenue had increased to more than it was under the old system—£2,434,326; while the net receipts—in 1841 only £410,028—have advanced to £965,442. In 1837, the Post Office paid £1743 to railways; in 1852, £329,963. In 1839, 188,921 money-orders, for £313,124, were issued; in 1852, the totals were 4,947,825 orders, for £9,438,277. In 1848, the loss on the money order system was £5745; in 1852, the profit was £11,664, the commission received having been £82,333; while the expenses were £70,669.

[THE ARTILLERY CROSSING THE PONTOON BRIDGE.]

THE CAMP AT CHOBHAM.

THE future heroes of England have had a surfeit of the pomp, glory, and circumstance of war. Scarcely a day has passed without their having been called out on active service. What between the desire of the commander, Lord Seaton, to render the ten thousand men at his disposal a model army, the pardonable pride of the officers to show off in the presence of royalty and the illustrious foreigners who have been attracted to the camp from all parts of the continent—even from republican America—and the enthusiasm of the troops themselves, it may safely be asserted, that in all her Majesty's wide dominions, no men have worked harder during the present summer. It has been all work and no play. One day it has been a regular pitched battle, with an uproar sufficient to frighten the very thunders that in summer-time reverberate among the Surrey Hills; the next day, the storming of a fortress; the following, a forced march—the most harassing of military duties; and probably on the succeeding day, an engagement which involved the daring, as well as delicate operation of crossing a river by means of a pontoon bridge.

This hazardous manoeuvre we witnessed. It took place on a small arm on the eastern side of that beautiful lake in Windsor Park—Virginia Water. The length of the bridge was 350 feet; and its breadth, or carriage-way, 12 feet.

But before we make our readers familiar with the particulars of this modern feature in warfare, we must inform them what a pontoon bridge is, and how it is constructed. We believe that the world is indebted for the suggestion to the mechanical genius of Sir Howard Douglas, formerly member for Liverpool, and highly distinguished for his scientific attainments. But Paisley, Blanchard, and others, have improved on the original idea, and it is quite wonderful to observe how rapidly a bridge of this description may be formed, so as to enable a large army—even one the Emperor of France or Russia could bring into the field—to cross the widest and most rapid streams in comparatively a very short space of time.

A pontoon is a hollow cylinder about twenty feet long, and nine in circumference—lined, in most instances, with a thin casing of wood about an inch thick, and covered carefully upon the outside with sheet copper, the edges of which are firmly rivetted together. In comparison with its size, its weight is a mere trifle, and herein consists its value, as a portable buoyant power.

On its outside surface, there are a number of rings and bars set in the copper, for the purpose of allowing the rafts to be lashed to it; while upon either end of the pontoon itself are strong metal rings, to which cables and small stream anchors are attached, to moor, as it were, fore and aft, in the centre of rapid rivers. Two of these pontoons having been placed at the required distance, a timber raft, about twelve feet broad and twelve feet long, made of strong planks, is placed upon it, and firmly secured in its position, so as to form a little bridge of the length we have mentioned, and rising by the buoyancy of the pontoons about three feet from the surface of the water. When a general is about to effect the passage of a river by means of these pontoons, the Sappers and Miners, who always have charge of them, form a number of these rafts in the manner we have indicated, and when the materials are at hand, the time for forming one raft is about seven minutes. Six privates or the Sappers and Miners, and one corporal in charge, to steer, is appointed to every raft, which is fitted at each outermost side with three rowlocks.

When these preparations are completed, the first raft, supported at both ends by a pontoon, is pushed out into the river, where the men in charge of it, from long practice, manage and direct its course with perfect ease. The proper situation having been reached, the stream anchors are instantly thrown out, and the first raft is firmly secured by stakes and ropes to the shore of the river. By the time this has been effected the next raft has been anchored in its place, and the men on the first raft instantly proceed to bolt the plankings of the first and second rafts together; the men on the second raft being similarly employed in securing theirs to the third, and so on. In this manner a perfect bridge is formed with marvellous celerity. Some commensurate idea may be formed of the rapidity of the operation when we state, that a bridge capable of transporting an army of 100,000 men, with all their heavy baggage and artillery, could be thrown across the Thames at Greenwich in half an hour. The time occupied at Virginia Water—a distance, as before stated, of about 350 feet—was something less than twenty minutes. It was pulled to pieces, and packed up on the waggons in thirty minutes.

To prevent the fire of an enemy's artillery taking much effect, each of the metal pontoons is subdivided inside into seven distinct water-tight compartments—so that should they be struck, and two of the compartments staved in, it would barely make the difference of an inch and a half in the rise of the pontoon from the water. The pontoons are arranged in what is called "intermediate order," for the passage of the general baggage of an army, with artillery and cavalry. When thus disposed, the pontoons are moored eight feet four inches apart. In open order, for the passage of infantry only, they are placed twelve feet apart; while in close order, for the transmission of the very heaviest descriptions of baggage, they are moored at intervals of about from one foot to eighteen inches—but this mode is seldom used. We may mention, that there are on the ground rafts of India-rubber pontoons, which are made buoyant by inflation. They are so portable as to be capable of being packed up and carried in a small case.

We should think shredded cork would answer the purpose. One pound of it will support a man in the water for an indefinite time, and the pontoons, when not wanted for the chief purpose for which they were intended, might be used as mattresses. In the latter capacity, the sanitary and domestic uses which cork-fibre may be made to serve, are now being tested in the camp. Cork-fibre mattresses have been liberally distributed throughout the encampment.

But all such suggestions will receive the maturest consideration from the competent authorities; and we hasten to state, that on the day we witnessed the pontooning—if we may so call it—the arrangements were admirable. There was not a hitch anywhere. An army marched to the borders of the lake, and seemed to concentrate itself before a bridge, supposed to be defended by a formidable enemy. The great guns opened their deafening roar, and the blue smoke rolling away in dense volumes, among and over the ancient trees of Windsor Forest, partially concealed the simulated contest from view. Never before had such echoes been awakened within the royal demesne. Had a Norman or a Plantagenet been permitted to have revisited the earth on the occasion, he would have fancied that the dread Scandinavian gods, in whom his piratical ancestors believed, were engaged in furious battle, to the hurricane howlings that mocked the roarings of the Paphian deity, when launching his lightnings down upon the rebellious children of the earth. However, as spirits do not now walk the earth—the progress of intellect has effectually exorcised them—they won't appear even at the bidding of spirit-rappers—her Majesty's lieges were right glad to behold her smiling face, instead of the grim visage of a king of war and violence; and while the contest at the bridge was raging dreadfully, and the idea made fully apparent that the foe had been coaxed into the belief that that was the principal point of attack, her Majesty's barge dropped quietly down the lake, and those who were lucky enough to detect the movement followed its course, and beheld the formation of a pontoon bridge, at a point screened from observation by a bend in the river, and the clouds of smoke which the dread artillery incessantly belched forth.

A signal was given, and the brigade of Sappers and Miners commenced their proceedings. While looking on in amazement, the bridge grew. So rapidly were the red pontoons brought together, that they seemed to drop into their places by magic. In twenty minutes a bridge was formed for the passage of infantry, cavalry and artillery. Everybody was delighted, and, we are well assured, cordially echoed the praises which the Queen bestowed on this arm of the service.

We publish the exact words of the memorandum "Her Majesty did not fail to observe the order, the silence, and the perfect acquaintance with every detail which prevailed throughout all ranks of the Sappers and Miners. Her Majesty highly appreciates the services of this portion of her army. From the date of its original formation, this corps has been remarkable in the annals of the British army, for the scientific attainments of its officers and the practical knowledge of its men, and has justly acquired the confidence and esteem of the army, by its skilful arrangements, and being at all times foremost in the perilous duties of war; in peace upholding its high reputation by the useful labours which it so cheerfully performs."

This is high praise, but it is richly deserved by the excellent and very intelligent corps of Sappers and Miners; for no men in the British army are harder worked, or have to encounter greater dangers. They are supposed to be ubiquitous, and to be capable of doing anything, from the undermining of a fortress to the repair of a camp kettle.

Well, the bridge having been completed, some riflemen dashed swiftly across it, realising to the imagination one of those scenes in an American forest in which Fenimore Cooper loved to revel. The dark figures, stealing so swiftly yet so silently along, might have been taken for Indians marching to surprise a foe as subtle as themselves. After the Rifles came the Foot Guards—true British grenadiers—who acknowledge no such "dictionary words" as fear and danger; some brave Highlanders, and, the opposite side being gained, and a smart action commenced with the now undecieved enemy, the Sappers and Miners rushed on to the bridge, and strewed it with fern. Then came the black, deep-throated cannon, and the foe, now no longer able to resist, fly in confusion, and a ringing cheer, in which the spectators heartily joined, proclaimed that the victory had been won. After a brilliant review, the word was given to march home again. Strange, for the England of this day, that a camp should be a home! but so it is: foreign politics and our colonial exigencies necessitate our keeping a sharp look-out; and if we must fight,

It would be madness to neglect the means, appliances, and due economy to be used in battle. The march homeward was very interesting. The troops, after leaving Windsor Forest, were allowed to do so almost as they liked. Some bivouacked in the fields, or on the road-side, to empty their tin cans and smoke their pipes. Not so the Highlanders. They, as if despising fatigue, and disdaining to acknowledge such a weakness as hunger, sternly went on their way, and reached camp without having once halted by the way.

FACETIÆ.

THERE are two reasons why we don't trust a man one because we don't know him, and the other because we do.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.—The following question now under debate before the Perkington Lyceum: "Which will sooner make a man rich—minding his own business, or letting other people's alone?"

WARNING TO FIDGETY WIVES.—If anything can justify a man for sometimes thinking of putting away his wife, it is when, despite of continual entreaty and admonition, she is always putting away his things.

A LIBERAL OFFER.—There is a tight-rope dancer, who offers to walk across the ocean, provided somebody will chalk the equinoctial line for him.

FULL OF LAW.—An editor, down South, who served four days on a jury, says he's so full of law that it is hard to keep from cheating somebody.

HINDOO LAW.—The Hindoo law says, "strike not, even with a blossom, thy wife, though she be guilty of a thousand faults."

WITTY RETORT.—Home Tooke, during his contest for Westminster, was thus addressed by a partisan of his opponent, of not a very reputable character: "Well, Mr. Tooke, you will have all the blackguards with you to-day." "I am delighted to hear it, sir, and from such good authority."

HERTFORDSHIRE BOORS.—The Hertfordshire peasants are notorious for their want of urbanity. Indeed, as regards all that relates to the bien-séances de société, they are as great brutes as any gentleman alive. A lady, while on a visit to a friend residing in the county, had, during her rides on horseback in the neighbourhood, become perfectly aware of the hardness of the peasantry. One day, when riding unattended, she came to a by-gate of her host's park, which had not a lodge. A chubby boy was swinging to and fro upon it. She ventured to beg that he would open it while she passed. To her utter amazement he did so! Delighted with his complacency, she gave him a shilling, observing, "It is quite clear, my lad, from your civility, that you are not a native of Hertfordshire." The reply was, "Thee'rt a liar—I be!"

THE DARK SIDE OF MATRIMONY.—Lately, a slave in the West Indies who had been married to another slave by one of the missionaries, at the end of three weeks brought his wife back to the clergyman, and desired him to take her again. The clergyman asked what was the matter with her? "Why, massa, she no good. The book says, she obey me. She no wash my clothes. She no do what I want her to do." The minister: "But the book says, you were to take her for better or for worse." "Yes, massa, but she all worse, and no better. She hab too much worse, and no good at all."

SOUND REASONING.—"How could you do so imprudent thing?" said a curate to a very poor Taffy. "What reason could you have for marrying a girl as completely steeped in poverty as yourself, and both without the slightest prospect of provision?" "Why, sir," replied the Benedict, "we had a very good reason. We had a blanket a-piece, and as the cold weather was coming on, we thought that putting them together would be warmer."

LEGAL BOTHERATION.—In "Maddock's Chancery Practice," vol. 1, p. 125, we find the following beautiful specimen of legal perspicuity: "When a person is bound to do a thing, and he does what may enable him to do the thing, he is supposed in equity to do it, with the view of doing what he is bound to do."

A DUTIFUL CHILD.—"How old are ye?" said Mr. Major Kiplins to a dwarfish young man. "Twenty."—"I wonder you aren't right down ashamed of being no bigger; you look like a boy of ten."—"All comes of being a dutiful child."—"How so?"—"When I was ten, father put his hand on my head, and said 'Stop there,' and he then ran away; I've never seen him since, and didn't think it right in me to go on growing without his leave."

CLERICAL PUN.—A parishioner inquired of his pastor the meaning of this line in Scripture: "He was clothed with curses as with a garment." "It signifies," replied the divine, "that that individual had got a habit of swearing."

POWERS OF MEMORY.—Boys are sometimes endowed with remarkable memories. The Keen family, of the state of Texas, consisted of three girls and a boy—the latter only four years old. They were all sitting round the fire one evening, engaged in telling how far back they could recollect. One of the girls recollected when she had "a doll that winked with both eyes." Another recollected when she was "a little baby at the breast, and Nancy tickled her feet." Johnny Keen, who was the last and least of them all, said he recollected "uwss than that." "How uwss?" said all the girls in a breath. "Oh, I recollect three weeks afore I've born, and how I cried all the time for fear I'd be a gal!"

QUERY.—Are not the persons who are praised for their taper fingers apt to be light fingered?

PALPABLE HIT.—A young farmer having purchased a watch, placed it in his box, and, strutting across the floor, says to his wife: "Where shall I drive a nail to hang my watch upon, that it will not be disturbed and broke?" "I do not know of a safer place," replied his wife, "than in our old meal-barrel. I'm sure no one will think of going there to disturb it."

NOTHING NEW.—A paragraph is going the round of the papers, stating, as a singular fact, that some consolidated cream has passed safely through the post. We are surprised at the newspapers considering this worthy of remark, since so much milk-and-water is daily sent in their columns by the same conveyance!

PAPPY. I know what makes some folks call pistols horse-pistols. "Why, my son?" "Because they kick so." "Mary, put that boy to bed: he is so sharp he will cut somebody."

When neighbour Jones went in to dinner, the other day, he found one of his apprentices in the kitchen, quietly rolling up his sleeves. "What are you going to do?" said Jones. "Oh," quietly responded the boy, "I am going to dive down into that pot, to see if I can find the bean that soup was made from."

A QUANT SMILE.—Methinks, to kiss ladies' hands after their lips, as some do, is like little boys, who, after they eat the apple, fall to the paring out of the love they have to the apple.

A LAWYER'S NAME.—A lawyer wrote rascal in the hat of a brother lawyer, who, on discovering it, entered a complaint in open court against the trespasser, who, he said, had not only taken his hat, but had written his own name in it.

QUAKER WOOLING.—"Martha, does thee love me?" asked a Quaker youth of one at whose shrine his heart's fondest feelings had been offered up. "Why, Seth," answered she, "we are commanded to love one another, are we not?" "Ay, Martha; but does not thee regard me with that feeling that the world calls love?" "I hardly know what to tell thee, Seth: I have greatly feared that my heart was an erring one; I have tried to bestow my love on all; but I may have sometimes thought, perhaps, that thee was getting rather more than thy share."

"Ma," said little Katy, "I don't think Solomon was as rich as they say he was." "Why, my dear?" asked the astonished mother. "Because he slept with his fathers, and I think if he had been so very rich he would have had a bed of his own."

GOOD-HUMOURED WIT is the elixir of life. Your genial, jovial, comic, graphic talker or writer does more to postpone the summons of grim death, than ten colleges of doctors and a thousand cords of drugs. Laughter serves as oil to our intricate machinery, keeping mind and body from dangerous friction by the cares of earth, and so enabling our systems to run smoother, perform better, and wear longer.

"It is good to feel humble, and to be humbled sometimes," as the donkey said when he undertook a race with a stage-hoss.

A ROYAL DODGE.—Musical performers who receive brooches and rings from the Czar, are able, without impropriety, to turn them into money, his majesty having instituted in his household an officer, whose special duty it is to buy back, at the full price, all the presents, he offers. Thus, "in Russia there are certain rings, brooches, bracelets, and snuff-boxes, which have been given away times without number."

HOW TO GET THE MEN TO PROPOSE.—It is said that printed declarations, with blank forms, are to be kept by young ladies who have lovers too modest to propose. The ladies themselves fill up the blanks; and of course no sensible man can refuse signing them.

A RING.—A sarcastic bachelor, in his random notes on men and manners, says: "Among the Romans the gift of a ring was a badge of liberation from slavery." Married people may best explain whether it is so among the moderns.

TABLE-MOVING A CRIME.—According to some of the German papers, several Jew rabbis have declared that the experiments of the turning tables are contrary to the law of Moses, and constitute a crime.

A NAME.—A witness in the Court of Common Pleas gave her name as "Elizabeth Martha Selina Georgiana Augusta Cuham Burrows." "This," she said, "was her 'Christendom name,'" but she did not in general write it in full.

A LITERALIST OR A JOKER.—The Bishop of Oxford, having sent round to the churchwardens in his diocese a circular of inquiries, among which was—"Does your officiating clergyman preach the gospel, and is his conversation and carriage consistent therewith?"—the churchwarden near Wallingford replied: "He preaches the gospel, but does not keep a carriage."

HOW COULD HE?—A gentleman who greatly disliked the custom of giving fees to servants, provided himself with some farthings, and on leaving the next party he attended, presented one to the footman, as he stood at the door. "I beg your pardon, sir," says Johnny, "bat you have made a mistake!"—"Oh, no," said the gentleman, "I never give less!"

A SURE HIT.—A sporting gentleman passing by a house, observing on the door the separate names of physician and surgeon, facetiously remarked, that the circumstance put him in mind of a double-barrelled gun—for if one missed, the other was sure to kill.

A SHORT SERMON, by a QUAKERESS, runs as follows: "Dear friends, there are three things I greatly wonder at. The first is, that children should be so foolish as to throw up stones and brickbats into fruit trees to knock down fruit: if they would let it alone it would fall itself. The second is, that men should be so foolish, and even so wicked, as to go to war and kill each other: if let alone they would die themselves. And the third and last thing which I wonder at is, that young men should be so unwise as to go after young women: since, if they would stay at home, the young women would come after them."

ANTI-WEATHER COMPANY.—A company has just been started, designated the "Umbrella Association," for the purpose of hiring out umbrellas and parasols in wet and sultry weather—the botrower to lodge a shilling for the safe return of the article; and pay one penny an hour for the loan. The company have already laid in a stock of 25,000 umbrellas and parasols, and intend forming several district depots in London.

LAUGHABLE ADVENTURE.—During the past winter, a reverend clergyman in Vermont, being apprehensive that the accumulated weight of the snow upon the roof of the barn might do some damage, resolved to prevent it by seasonably shovelling it off. He therefore ascended it, having first, for fear the snow might all slide off at once, and himself with it, fastened to his waist one end of a rope, and, giving the other to his wife, he went to work; but, fearing still for his safety, "My dear," said he, "tie the rope round your waist!" No sooner had she done this, than off went the snow, poor minister and all, and up went his wife. Thus, on the one side of the barn the astounded and confounded clergyman hung; but on the other side hung his wife, high and dry, in majesty sublime, dangling at the other end of the rope. At that moment, however, a gentleman luckily passed by, and delivered them from their perilous situation.

A barber once headed his advertisement with the following parody on Goldsmith:

Man wants but little beard below,
Nor wants that little long.

ROMANCES generally end with a marriage. And many young girls, when they leave school, would wish to go through the romance of life, as they do most romances, by beginning at the end.

"I want to borrow a hundred pounds," said a fast young man to a Jew usurer. "What security can you give?" "My own personal security, sir." "Very well—go in here," says the Jew, lifting up the lid of a large iron chest. "Get in there!" exclaimed the other, in astonishment; "what for?" "Why that is the place where I always keep my securities."

Is pig-iron anything like pettified pork?

The business hours of birds differ from our own, their notes being mostly given out before 10 a.m.

The following complimentary conversation once took place between Balzac, the novelist, and Dumas, the dramatist. Balzac: Monsieur Dumas, when I am worn out, I will take to writing plays. Dumas: Then you will do well to begin at once. Balzac: If I begin to-morrow morning, you will be forgotten to-morrow night.

Why are pantalons like wells? Give it up, eh? Because they have spring bottoms.

MARTIAL, the witty Roman poet, speaking of a lazy barber of his time, complains that while he was tediously going over the face of a customer, another beard grew out.

DEFINITION OF HUMBUG.—A severe instance of the use of the term "humbug" occurred in a court of justice. A female in giving her evidence repeatedly used this term. In her severe cross-examination, the counsel (a very plain, if not an ugly person) observed she had frequently used the term humbug, and desired to know what she meant by it, and to have an explanation; to which she replied: "Why, sir, if I was to say you were a very handsome man, would you not think I was humbugging you?" The counsel sat down perfectly satisfied.

THE TREE OF LOVE.—During the early settlement this country, when Boloxe—now a little watering-place on Lake Pontchartrain—was garrisoned by the French troops, a young officer, who had been refused leave of absence to return home, solemnly vowed that he would marry the first woman who should come over from France, be she young or old, provided she would have him. Soon after an emigrant ship arrived, and the passengers were disembarked in boats, which, on account of the very shallow water, grounded some twenty yards from the shore. The young officer, who had been watching the proceedings, rushed into the water and approached the boats. Casting his eye rapidly around at the females, he soon discovered a very beautiful young girl, and, with his native politeness, he greeted his countrymen and women, and informed the latter that they would have to be carried ashore. He then offered his services to the young girl, which were at once accepted, and he carried her to the beach. They walked along the sand until they came to a beautiful grove of catalpa-trees, and there sat down to enjoy the grateful shade. Here the young soldier told his vow, and declared his love, which the dark-eyed beauty accepted, and, on account of this incident, the catalpa-tree was called l'arbre d'amour—The Tree of Love!—American Paper.

MATHEWS MISGUIDED.

DURING an Irish debate, Mathews was a constant attendant at the House of Commons. He took his station under the gallery, by permission of the Speaker. These debates being frequently carried on to a late hour, his friend Mr. Parratt, of Millbank, gave him a bed at his house. One night, on his way to Millbank, having got half way home, he was, from fatigue, arising from his lameness, compelled to rest against a post.

It is pretty well known that Mathews had many antipathies—such as one year hating mutton and eating nothing but beef, and the next, disliking beef and eating nothing but mutton. Amongst other things, he had a great dislike to the jingling of keys, or the rattling of money in another person's pocket. On the present occasion, he had partially recovered himself, and was hesitating whether it were better to proceed, or to return (that is, to return to the coach-stand in Palace Yard, or go to Mr. Parratt's), when he heard a sound like the rattling of keys close to him; and, turning round to see whence it came, he beheld a tall man, with a great coat reaching down to his heels, who civilly inquired if he was ill, and whether he could afford him any assistance. Mathews told him where he was going, and that he was lame. They had not proceeded many yards, when the same jingling noise arrested his attention, which his new friend perceiving, advised a slower pace. This being adopted, the unwelcome sound ceased, and they got on remarkably well till they arrived at the Horseferry Road.

The moment they came in sight of the Thames, up went his conductor's arms suddenly and violently, and the keys again rattled; they were then immediately under an immense gas-lamp of a gin-palace, and Mathews looked down to see where the noise came from: his new friend's coat having blown open, he saw—oh, horror!—appendages to his legs that clearly proved he had just broken out of prison. Expecting he should be murdered, and that the raising of his hand was a signal for assistance, spite of his lameness, Mathews took to his heels, and ran every step of the way till he reached his friend's door, never venturing to look back, until the use he had made of his friend's knocker had not only roused the inmates, but half the neighbourhood; then, looking towards the water, he saw his fettered acquaintance limp into a boat, and row off with all possible celerity.

THE term "Putting your foot in it," it seems, is of legitimate origin. According to the "Asiatic Researches," a very curious mode of trying the title to land is practised in Hindostan. Two holes are dug in the disputed spot, in each of which the lawyers on either side put one of their legs, and there remain until one of them is tired, or complains of being stung by insects—in which case his client is defeated. In this country it is generally the client, and not the lawyer, who "puts his foot in it!"

A PROBABLE HYPOTHESIS.—If the Sublime Porte had acknowledged the Czar as Protector of the Greek Church, we suppose that respectable community would have been styled the veritable Russian Bear's Greece.—Ibid.

THE MILITIA.—Whatever the fact may be, it seems reasonable to expect that the agricultural counties should supply the best soldiers, considering the experience of the rustic in field practice, and the knowledge they must have of drilling.—Ibid.

LANDLADY: Mr. Rapid, without you immediately settle your rent, I shall be compelled to — Mr. R.: Mrs. Wiggins, if you pester me, with so little reference to my personal comfort, I'll bring an action against you for assault: I'll issue a commissio de lunatico inquirendo, upon which I'll certify for a scire facias, or a nolle prosequi; and I'll send you into a primâ facie certiorari, and sign a judgment of quis clavis ambulator, and make you pay your own costs! Landlady: Oh! oh dear, sir, if that's the case, I—I—I'll gladly w—w—wait!—Ibid.

THE BABES OF BABYLON.—We flatter ourselves that we have discovered an omission in the recent Cab Act, which sufficiently demonstrates our acumen, as well as the interest which we take in the trials of poor cabbies. Our astounding discovery is this—does a baby come under the head of a passenger, or as luggage? and how should it be charged?—Ibid.

CAMP INTELLIGENCE.—The yellow fever prevails among the troops stationed at Up Park Camp, Jamaica. The Blues prevail at Chobham. There is a division in the Mormon Camp. The troops at Chobham will not go again to Virginia Water: so much water having come to them, they will be able to study aquatic manoeuvres on the spot. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge slept at the camp a few nights ago. His tent was illuminated with camphine. It is reported of many of the officers at Chobham, that they are so much involved, they can scarcely keep their heads above water. During a recent review, one of the London swell mob picked a pocket, and immediately decamped.—Ibid.

ACCOUNTED FOR.—Notwithstanding the heat of the weather, London housewives affirm that meat keeps better this year than any of the preceding. This is indubitable, when we consider that all "cousins" of the cooks are encamped at Chobham.—Ibid.

BEWARE OF THE SELLER.—In addition to the fines inflicted on dishonest tradesmen, the Leet jury might adopt a species of epithetical punishments peculiarly fitted to the peculation committed. For instance—a cheating corn-dealer should be branded as a rogue in grain; a butcher with false weights as a gross impostor; and an amalgamator of sand with sugar a grosser!—Ibid.

ADVICE TO GABBLING M.P.'s.—When you resolve upon making a speech, copy the cook who, preparing a sheep's head, never dishes up the tongue without the brains.—Punch.

DIGESTIVE APPARATUS.—The best "grubber" obtained a prize at the late agricultural gathering at Gloucester; but we are not informed whether the successful competitor was a citizen, who emptied a tureen of turtle, or a ploughman, who devoured "a leg of mutton and trimmings." In such a contest town would be likely to beat country; at least if the grubbing-match were open to the corporation of London.—Ibid.

STRENGTH APPARENTLY ACCOUNTED FOR.—Notwithstanding the small size of the Aztec children, they are exceedingly strong. An incurable punster says they doubtlessly derived this strength from Gymn-aztecs, from whom it probably descended in a straight line.—Ibid.

WHAT IS A CABMAN'S MILE?—The question of "What is a mile?" is likely to take its place by the side of the important question, "What is a pound?" in the annals of political—or some other kind of—economy. Since the new act has come into force—or rather into operation, for its potency is not yet much felt—there has been a fearful conflict of opinion between the cab-drivers and the public as to what is a mile. It is evident that there must be an appendix added to all the books on arithmetic, for the purpose of including cab measure, which is quite distinct from any other measure we have yet met with, and is about as diametrically opposed to long measure as chalk is to any caseal or curdy compound. In the eyes of a cabman, "a miss is as good as a mile;" in fact, anything is as good as a mile for him—that is his passenger's—money.—Ibid.

GEORGIAN AND CIRCASSIAN SLAVES IN TURKEY.

ANOTHER source from which vacant harems are filled is the market of Georgian slaves; but it is by no means so popular. These unhappy creatures, who are embarked at Trebisond on board of the regular steamers, reach Constantinople in a very sad and pitiable state. We can imagine an European reader almost envying the captain under whose care is placed so poetical a cargo; but, alas! the truth is, that the Georgians are looked upon almost as suspiciously as a hundred cases of leeches for the Marseilles market. It is true they are separated as much as possible from the rest of the passengers, penned in like a flock of sheep, and hidden by dirty clothes; or, in bad weather, crammed below, like negroes in the middle passage. In spite of these precautions, the whole vessel suffers from their presence. Without exception, every one brings away a colony of native vermin. This is easily accounted for. The poor things resemble not a bevy of English maidens going out voluntarily. They are sold, from poverty or avarice, by their parents or friends, and are handed over, nearly naked, to the purchaser. To dress them would eat up all the profits. Such is the costume in which they crowd by day, and huddle together at night, whispering or dreaming of the splendour which has been promised them, to dispel their sorrow, and perhaps giving a passing thought to the home which has cast them forth, like the pet lamb when it has outgrown the fondness or the patience of its mistress. The merchant, with the uncalculating stupidity which characterises all dealers in human flesh, fattens these future sultanas during the voyage on water and millet-flour porridge. They arrive at their journey's end in such a state, that few connoisseurs in incipient beauty would venture to pronounce an opinion.

Sometimes, when the owner is in haste to realise, he drives his Georgian flock to market in the unseemly condition in which they come ashore; or at most throws around them a feringeh—the mantle of the Turkish women. Chance for the most part presides over the sale. The purchaser keeps at a respectful distance from his acquisition, as a doctor might from a plague patient; and drives her before him to what may be called a preparatory school for the harem. A number of old women, indeed, gain their living by polishing up this rough material; combing their hair into shape, scrubbing them, and exterminating the reminiscences they have brought with them from their native hovels. From the class of women I have thus described most of the consorts of persons high in rank are taken. Such are the mothers of the ministers of the Sublime Porte—ay, and of all the sultans that have ever reigned on the shores of the Bosphorus.—The Turks in Europe.

MISCELLANEOUS.

"THE ANGEL'S WHISPER."—The admirers of that popular song will be surprised to find that there prevails in India a tradition very similar to the one on which that song is founded. The other day our Hindoo nurse was watching our baby asleep, and, noticing that it frequently smiled, said: "God is talking to it!" The tradition, as elicited from this woman, seems to be here, that when a child smiles in its sleep, God is saying something pleasing to it; but when it cries, He is talking to it of sorrow.—Notes and Queries.

THE TURKS AND THE FLESH OF THE FIG.—There is a race of wild bears in Egypt, of the flesh of which, though it be insipid, the Europeans, from perversity, are fond. I once saw a cage containing four little ones sent to an English lady. It was carried through the streets by two great shamed-faced porters, whom a crowd of urchins and idlers followed and hooted. They were so annoyed that they dropped their burthen, and began cursing Christianity, whilst the sucking bears took to flight, pursued by a shower of stones and slippers. I remember, however, that on one occasion a fine Gratz ham was boiled for our use on board the boat. There were rumours among the crew whilst the cauldron was over the fire. They seemed to consider themselves almost as accomplices of a sacrilege. But when the steaming ham was fished out by a hook at the end of a pole, and deposited with respectful contempt upon the dish, the men collected round at a certain distance with expanded nostrils, sniffing in the unholly odour; and one of them, in a moment of gastronomic conviction, exclaimed: "Wallah, how nice it smells! What a pity it is a sin!"—Bayle St. John's Turks in Europe.

WHO ARE THE PEOPLE?—The manners of a people are not to be found in the schools of learning, or the palaces of greatness, where the national character is obscured or obliterated by travel or instruction, by philosophy or vanity; nor is public happiness to be estimated by the assemblies of the gay, or the banquets of the rich. The great mass of nations is neither rich nor gay: they whose aggregate constitutes the people are found in the streets and villages, in the shops and farms; and from them, collectively considered, must the measure of general prosperity be taken.

EXTRAORDINARY MONOMANIA.—A landed proprietor in the Gironde, M. de Coers, died, a short time since, bequeathing to his heirs a fortune amounting to two millions of francs. The old gentleman was a great friend to the poor of his neighbourhood, and also acquired a high reputation from his theoretical labours on the subject of agriculture and drainage of land. Towards the latter part of his life, in consequence of a brain fever, he laboured under a singular kind of monomania. If he happened to see a knife, a dagger, or an old National Guard sabre, he spared nothing to possess it, and would even do so by unlawful means, taking advantage of any favourable opportunity to carry it off unseen by its owner. In the space of six months he had cleared the half of the houses of his commune of all their cutlery, the owners winking at his petty larceny, as they were amply remunerated for their loss by his family. At his death there were found in one cabinet, the key of which he always carried in his pocket, two thousand knives, swords, and sabres, ranged in order on stands, and each having a ticket attached, with the name of the person to whom it had belonged, and the date when the old gentleman had become possessed of it.—French Paper.

SULTANAS ABROAD.

NEARLY all Turkish women sally out every Friday to take the air, away from the town, on the banks of the Bosphorus, or to some of the places where water and shade may be found. The wealthy go in carts without springs, of unwieldy and primitive construction—six or seven heaped together—and sometimes their husbands lead the oxen or horses to the chosen spot, and then go away, leaving the women perfectly free to enjoy themselves as they please. The most popular amusements are the singing and music of the gipsy women, who repair thither for the purpose—music which is amorously languid, and singing which is detestably indecent. A lunch is generally brought out, and when this is dispatched, smoking and drinking commence—drinking, not of sherbet, but of good brandy, or other strong liquors, which soon induce a boisterous gaiety, so that the sultanas, whom we often imagine as pining away imprisoned, may be seen rolling in convulsions of inextinguishable laughter on the turf, or huddled up in a still more advanced stage of intoxication, like bundles of rags. The Montenegrin servants, who are the privileged beholders of these scenes, are often compelled to haul them into their carts, in which they are jolted back to the harem. Those who are not too far gone frequently pull up in passing through the Christian quarter, at the doors of taverns, to get more drink and a file of a hundred carts may often be seen stopping in one street, all full of women, some made bold and chattering by their excess, others hanging sleepily about and murmuring to be taken home.

There is a walk planted with elm-trees, not far from the city, where only women are admitted. Two or three thousand assemble there at a time, and, sitting upon a verdant slope, enjoy the indescribable pantomime of a comedy, which some infamous Jews, hired for the purpose, perform on the limits of the forbidden ground, for their amusement.

Europeans, of course, cannot enter the walk itself, but they may see the crowds collected at a distance, and hear the shrill applause which every act more than usually beastly of the mountebanks creates in the female crowd. On these occasions it would scarcely be possible for a stranger to recognise eastern life from the descriptions he is accustomed to read. The free conduct of the women has more than once attracted the attention of the government, which not very long ago published an edict, complaining that they remained out late at night, that they rode forth in coaches with young Christian drivers; that they ventured into shops, especially those of apothecaries; and even pushed their audacity so far as to eat ices in the Frankish coffee-houses of Galata and Pera. The edict accordingly recommended that early hours should be kept, and forbade women to enter shops of any kind, or be driven about by young coachmen. These interferences with manners which were supposed to be great advances in civilisation, and which seem strangely accompanied by proclamations giving permission to women to appear on the public promenades, were of course ineffectual. The women continue their old customs, though some have been hanged or drowned for being found in the back shops of Christians. It will require something else besides repressive measures to bring about a reform in this respect. All laws in the East, moreover, have the temporary character of proclamations. They are applied for a day and forgotten. It is forbidden, for example, most expressly for shopmen to have any other than old men as servants and they, almost without exception, have spruce, dashing young attendants.—The Turks in Europe.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

UNCLE SAM.—The three best tragic actors on the British stage at present, are—Mr. G. V. Brooke, Mr. Phelps, and Mr. Charles Keen.

GRIEF.—Why register the child by a wrong name? That would be foolish and criminal—for, under the Births, Deaths, and Marriages Act, the parents' names are required to be faithfully stated. The wish of the mother to conceal the fact of her marriage, shows that she has little womanly self-respect.

MADELINE.—Presents, as tokens of esteem or friendship, should not be costly, neither should they be articles of apparel—gloves alone excepted. Books or jewellery offer the most suitable selections—taste must determine the choice.

J. D. READ.—You have misunderstood the intention of our notice. What we aimed at saying, and did say, was that the Legislature could not consistently sanction the opening of the Crystal Palace on Sunday, unless it repealed the acts against Sunday trading, and explicitly declared how Sunday should be observed.

NAUTICS.—The tonnage of the commerce of the Port of London is considerably less than that of Liverpool; but, on the other hand, the number of ships engaged in the commerce of the Port of London considerably exceeds that of Liverpool. The explanation is, that the ships that frequent and leave the Mersey are of very great tonnage.

SIRIUS.—Under the new act, all dogs are taxed—there are no exemptions; and very properly—for the dog-mania has become an intolerable nuisance.

MARY.—The kings of England quartered the arms of France with those of England from the year 1330—when Edward III. laid claim to that kingdom as the son of Isabella, sister of Charles the Handsome, who died without issue—until 1801. Of course all pretensions on the part of England to France had long ceased. The force was terminated on the union of this kingdom with Ireland, when the ensign of Ireland was inserted in the place which the arms of France had occupied.

T. H. TROLLOPE.—Table and hat-moving would seem to indicate the existence of a power of which at present we have not any adequate idea, and for the present we must decline giving an opinion either way. The general impression is, that Professor Faraday's explanation of the phenomena is the true one.

EMMA LOUISA.—Your engaged lover, who is in Australia, sent his portrait to a young lady acquaintance—not to you. Such conduct is very unlover-like, and we should think Mr. P. somewhat of a scamp. But such perversions are all owing to emigration. How can a man be the same, when under the influence of the gold mania?

JAMES, aged thirty-seven, with a good business, knows two ladies—one twenty-five years of age, the other thirty-five; either, he thinks, would make a good wife. In fortune, expectations, and attractions they are equal. Which should he prefer? Why, the one that will have him. But if he has yet to choose, let him take the best-tempered. To a man in business, a sweet-tempered wife is worth more to him than all his best customers together. But if the ladies are quite on a par in this respect—just as like each other as two peas—we should say the youngest; for, after a woman has turned forty, she is not quite so active in business as she was between twenty-five and forty. Still it must be said that some women at thirty-five are younger-looking and sounder in constitution than many at twenty. In choosing a wife, health should be considered.

INDEX EXPUN.—The majority of our assurance companies are proprietary, others are mutual, and some are mixed. The law regulating joint-stock companies requires these societies to subscribe to a form of registration—that is, they are to state the amount of their capital, paid and unpaid, the number of the shareholders, and the shares held by them respectively. Now, this is no protection whatever to the public; for, as regards the capital, the returns may be fictitious—and with reference to the shareholders, a company of five hundred may be limited, as to solvency, to half a dozen. But it is notorious, as regards the registration business, that all sorts of tricks are resorted to. This is positively all the guarantee provided by the law for the safety and soundness of institutions whose operations extend over an area of upwards of thirteen hundred millions of pounds, and involve, in their working, the very stability of the empire. It says much for the respectability, prudence, and good management of the majority of these companies, that no disaster has occurred; but immunity in the past is not to be accepted as security for the future. Our insurance companies have been successful, but they are not safe. The public require some guarantee against fraud, of a preventive character.

S. D. K.—Your case is a pitiful one, but the blame rests with the system. Imprisonment for debt had become so tremendous an evil in the reigns of the three first Georges, that charity attempted its correction by building prisons for debtors: the state lent a helping hand—Acts of Parliament were passed to relieve the goals of their pressure of inmates, imperfect classification was adopted, eleemosynary relief encouraged—but all to no beneficial purposes: debtors multiplied ad infinitum, and county rates for their support had to be levied. This touched the pockets of the whole community, and led to the passing of acts under which insolvents might be liberated by application to a court that was established at an enormous expense. Still there was no inquisition of prisoners: those who had money or friends passed through the court very readily—those who had neither, remained in prison. And that is the law of England to this very day. There are no means by which a debtor can be discharged from prison except by his own petition, supported by money, the death of the claiming creditor, or a discharge by the latter, after he has thought to have taken sufficient satisfaction. For felons and misdemeanants there are assizes and sessions—a fair trial and no favour; and what we ask for is, that the same measure of justice should be extended to the debtor.

S. A. C.—Capital should be free as the winds. It cannot be coerced with safety. Being merely the representative of the productive power, it is a fluctuating medium, valuable only for its representation of material interests and the facilities it affords for those exchanges of which labour is the base. It is sufficiently trammelled by the necessities of banking, without being subjected to any other restrictions; for, after all, capital is but a system of credit, based on unlimited confidence, which, if once shaken, not only becomes weakened in itself, but injures all the interests it is intended to accommodate. The history of our manufactures furnishes abundant evidence in favour of this trading and commercial treasure. When the despotic governments of Europe chose harshly to interfere with the consciences and pursuits of their subjects, the latter fled to England in considerable numbers—when they laid the foundation of our present manufacturing greatness: thus proving that money and industry had no particular affection for any land, but liked that best where they were least meddled with. Capitalists are no patriots, in the political sense of the word; their country is that which allows them the most elbow-room. Capital is simply credit, wielded by a few, and its solvency imperatively requires that it should be unfettered—that its owners should buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest markets: and this rule, upon due examination, will be found to apply equally as well to labour as to the iron or cotton upon which that labour is exercised.

J. H. G.—It is usual, but not necessary, that before a gentleman can be ordained for the ministry of the Church of England, he must have taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

J. JOHNSON.—Any person styling himself, and practising as a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, when not authorised to do so, is liable to be prosecuted.

W. J. L.—The young man's opinion of you was correct. You have a very soft place in your head. Your foolish criticisms must render you very disagreeable to your acquaintances.

JOHN HOLDS.—Your mother must take out letters of administration for her deceased husband's effects—and after payment of the debts, take one-third, and divide the remaining two-thirds between yourself and brother.

R. N.—1. On entering a company composed of persons you are not acquainted with, you must only shake hands with the hostess. Her duty is to introduce you to such of her friends as she desires you to know. 2. A tiff—nothing more. Renew the courtship as speedily as possible.

GENEVRA loves a middle-aged gentleman, and is almost certain she is warmly loved in return; but he appears to hesitate to avow his passion—she thinks from a dread of being refused. What shall she do? Wait. This apparently timid man is evidently a shrewd man of the world. He is studying her character and disposition—buying her with as much coolness as a butcher would buy a sheep. The feeling on neither side is love. On hers it is a penchant—on his, a cold wish to have the sanction of the law and religion to a marriage of convenience.

DE VERE having married under a professional name, and having a small property, which is left by will to the eldest son, wishes to know whether the child can substantiate his claim to the property, and the most advisable course to pursue under the circumstances. The marriage is good, but it will have to be proved by the declaration of the pair themselves, by that of the minister who officiated, and of the persons who were present. This comes of deception. In this instance there is a probability that the child will never be put into possession of the property.

E. COOPER.—All the higher departments of literature have an excellence peculiarly their own—all are great and ennobling; but biography and history take the first rank—they are the duces of the armies of books. History takes precedence, because it chronicles the doings and elaborates the characters of nations. Biography gives us the lives of individuals, and if history could only be rendered as graphic and poignant, there would be but small demand for the labour of the romancist.

THE LILY, BY M. M. M.

Should the rude wind too roughly blow,
Then would you gem of living snow
Droop o'er its parent bed!
And though the mildest breeze should play,
Nor evening's dew, nor morning's ray,
Could raise its weeping head!

Ah! thus by dark suspicion's breath,
The rose of love was chilled to death,
Never to blossom more.
In vain did hope contend with fear,
Nor sweetest smile, nor softest tear,
Could e'er that rose restore.

ADAM DAWES.—The Japanese group of islands extends from the 31st to the 42nd degree of north latitude, and from the 157th to the 175th degree of east longitude. It is composed of three main islands, with innumerable smaller ones, which, strutting the sea along its coasts, render them dangerous and difficult—and therefore protect the empire from the sudden invasion of foreigners. The existence of the Japanese islands was revealed to Europe towards the close of the thirteenth century, by Marco Polo, the great Venetian traveller. For three centuries after his time Japan remained in obscurity, or was only referred to as an invention of the imagination. The Portuguese, the great navigators of the sixteenth century, once more brought it to light; and the Jesuits, always the enterprising missionaries of the Roman Catholic church, had nearly completed the conversion of the whole nation, when an accident interrupted, and eventually destroyed their labours. The Dutch followed in their wake, and have still a settlement on the coast. The intercourse of the Japanese with the rest of the world is very limited; and their policy, like that of the Chinese, is strictly to prohibit any at all. The population is estimated at 40,000,000, and the country is considered very rich. A trade with Japan would of course open up a new channel of commerce to the British and the people of the United States of America.

GOODWYN BARNEY.—Your song has rather pleased us, but we object to your insinuation about there not being equal rights and laws in this country.

FILL UP THE CUP.

Fill up the cup of human bliss,
And let its brim with toasts be crowned,
And while its beaded froth we kiss,
Oh, let us pass the bliss-cup round!

The scales of justice!—May they weigh
In balance fair the people's cause,
Until we measure out the day
By equal rights and equal laws.

The light of truth!—Oh, may it shine
On palace gate and cottage door,
Until it makes all souls divine,
And green earth sunny more and more!

The ring of love!—Oh, may it wed,
Not only loving heart and heart,
But distant shores to one great head,
Until there is no foreign part!

Then fill the cup of human bliss,
And let its brim with toasts be crowned,
And while its beaded froth we kiss,
Oh, let us pass the bliss-cup round!

A. R. B.—The military Order of the Bath was first instituted by Henry IV. On the day of his coronation, he conferred the honour on forty-six esquires—who had watched all the night before, and had bathed themselves. After the coronation of Charles II. the order was neglected until the year 1725, when it was revived and re-organised. In January, 1815, it was ordained that, "for the purpose of commemorating the auspicious termination of the long and arduous contests in which this empire has been engaged," the order should consist of three classes: the first, not more than seventy-two Knights Grand Crosses, exclusive of the sovereign and the princes of the blood; the second to be Knights Commanders, to take precedence of Knights Bachelors. With the exception of twelve, who may be appointed for civil or diplomatic services, those only are eligible to these first two orders who are not below the rank of major-general in the army, or rear-admiral in the navy. The third class are called Companions of the Order. They take precedence of esquires, but are not entitled to the appellation of Knights Bachelors—which, as all our readers are aware, is the oldest, and was formerly the most distinguished order of knighthood. It is chiefly borne now by men who have obtained civic or literary honours; but a true author rarely accepts the distinction—artists are not so nice.

M. M. M.—The planet-ruling prophet, and the "seers" of all grades, are unmitigated impostors—their pursuits are criminal.

DIALLUS.—We do not think the government of Russia would proceed to the extreme barbarism of inflicting injury on British subjects in Russia, in the event of a war between the two countries. No doubt they would be subjected to the surveillance of the police, or possibly ordered to leave the country; but we do not think that probable—for the English in Russia are useful—they are chiefly employed in educational and scientific capacities.

SIDUS.—The library of the British Museum is mismanaged. As regards the admissions, every obstacle is thrown in the way of obtaining them. You must write to Sir Henry Ellis, and will direct a printed circular to be forwarded to you.

JAMES LYNN.—A marking-ink may be made very cheaply. Press the juice from a sufficient number of ripe sloes to make half a pint, then burn two ounces of horse-beans in a tin shovel or old saucapan-lid, and putting them into a linen rag, simmer them in the sloe-juice for half an hour. Strain the decoction thus made through a muslin bag, and it is ready for use. The article to be marked must be perfectly dry before doing so.

PICKLES is in a pickle. Cut by the girl he really loves, and courted by the one he does not, he is at a loss how to act. The wisest thing he can do is to run away from both. There is honour as well as discretion in avoiding a distasteful engagement.

E. J. W. The three-half-pence per pound duty on paper, is one of the iniquities of our fiscal system—for it is an obstacle in the way of the education of the mind, and the moral training of the nation. To a certain extent it is a complete prohibition of the dissemination of useful information, and healthy, humanising sentiment. For the press, after all, is the greatest instrument in the elevation of the human family. The public generally have scarcely any perception of the evil nature of this incumbence on literature. It not only cripples the producing powers of publishers, but confines the works of our best authors to the limited circles of the affluent, and entails upon those who have the courage to cater cheaply for the mental palate of the age, the positive risk of certain ruin, should their undertaking—as in the case of this Journal—not be rewarded by the most extraordinary success. It is clear that in no business is capital a greater essential than in literature. In its pursuits, from beginning to end, nothing can be done without money; and we consider the £800,000 per annum collected on paper, to be nothing more or less than an abstraction from the pockets of those who contribute more largely to the welfare of their species, than the senate and church combined.

B. Y. Z.—The existence of volcanoes in the moon being admitted, could those stony substances which have fallen on the earth from the air, have been projected from the moon? It is a nice question, but not one to ridicule, when we know that no greater velocity would be required for a body—say a stone—to be shot beyond the moon's attraction, than five times and a half that of a cannon-ball: and as our volcanoes have projected rocks with a greater velocity than that, the idea is more probable than it appears at first sight. That eminent man, M. Arago, says: "It is the most probable opinion of all, and hitherto the only one that satisfies all the phenomena observed."

CANTOR ENTERING THE BED-ROOM OF THE MISER, AT THE TRAVELLERS' REST.]

WOMAN AND HER MASTER.

CHAPTER IV.

Thus, if eternal justice rules the ball,
Thus shall your wives, and thus your children fall,
On all the line a sudden vengeance waits,
And frequent hearers shall besiege your gates;
There passengers shall stand, and, pointing, say,
Whilst the long funerals blacken all the way:
Lo! these are they whose breasts the furies stealed,
And cursed with hearts unknowing how to yield.

POPE'S ELEGY ON THE DEATH OF AN UNFORTUNATE LADY.

ALTHOUGH the domestics at Briancourt Mansion—or the Hall, as it was more generally called in the neighbourhood—lived in considerable awe of their haughty lady and her crafty son, still, servant-like, they would talk. The footmen who had been commanded to remove the unfortunate Clara from the presence of her unnatural mother, had repeated the words she had uttered in the housekeeper's room—from the housekeeper's room they had been whispered in the kitchen. The following morning it was generally known throughout the establishment that the wretched, half-starved wanderer, whose corpse still lay in the gilded saloon above, was the long-banished daughter of their unforgiving mistress—and many and bitter were the comments on her vindictive nature.

"Dear young lady!" said the housekeeper, wiping aside a tear; "her sorrows are ended! Poor as I am, I would not have her mother's heart, her mother's dreams, for all the wealth she has inherited."

"It will never make her happy!" observed the butler, emphatically; "it can't."

"Never—never!" chimed in several of the upper servants.

At that moment the library bell rang twice: the usual summons for the house-steward, Mr. Barnes—a tall, thin, silent personage, who glided about the mansion like a shadow, and performed his duties with the methodical regularity of a machine.

He was one of those men whom an earthquake would scarcely have moved. In early life he had been the personal attendant of the late baronet, who held him in great esteem. It was generally said of him that he heard and saw everything, but said little.

"Your bell, Mr. Barnes!" observed the housekeeper.

The old man rose from his seat, and, without uttering a word, left the room.

"If he would only speak," said the butler, looking after him, "he could tell why her ladyship was so inveterate against Miss Clara, for marrying young George Stanley. Though poor, he was a gentleman, and brought no disgrace upon the family; but she never could endure to hear him named."

The conversation was interrupted by the appearance of Miss Sarah Tubby, Lady Briancourt's own maid—a sour, unamiable spinster, who was hated by the rest of the servants—not so much on account of the influence she exercised over their mistress, as for the use she made of it, to render every one in the house as uncomfortable as she could.

No sooner did she enter the room, than the butler suddenly remembered that he had the plate to clean—the head cook retired to her sanctuary in the kitchen. All but Mrs. Brandon, the housekeeper, who disdained to show any fear of her, made their escape.

"Chattering again!" said the domestic spy, with a sneer.

"Did you listen?" demanded the old lady, bristling up.

"Listen, ma'am!"

"Listen, miss!" repeated Mrs. Brandon; "I spoke the word plainly enough! If so, you know the old proverb, about certain persons seldom hearing any good of themselves! And how should they," she added, bitterly, "unless from those who are as false and deceitful as themselves?"

Miss Tubby's naturally bilious complexion changed to a sickly red, and her deep-set grey eyes, which were unusually small, sparkled like an enraged viper's. It was very seldom that she mastered her temper—but on the present occasion she did contrive to subdue it. It was not her cue to show fight—her errand was to conciliate.

"My observation, Mrs. Brandon, was not intended to apply to you!" she made answer.

"Nor mine to you, Miss Tubby!" said the housekeeper, cooling down, "any more than yours to me—of course not!"

Satisfied with these mutual concessions, the severity and equivocal of which neither felt disposed to question, the ladies sat down, like two belligerents who respected each other's powers, and did not wish to provoke an encounter there having been too many drawn battles between them.

"Oh, Mrs. Brandon," sighed the spinster, "my nerves have been horribly shaken!"

"Have they?"

"I don't feel at all like myself this morning."

The old lady mentally observed that she at least looked most unpleasantly like herself; but, peace being established between them, she confined the observation between her lips.

"This wretched woman," continued the speaker, "managed to rush up into the drawing-room, nearly frighten my lady out of her senses, and then to die! How exceedingly distressing! Shocking!"

"Very!" said the housekeeper, who was determined to see the drift of her visitor's conversation before she committed herself.

"Of course she was mad!" added the waiting-maid.

"Was she? Poor thing!"

"I heard Lawyer Quirk tell Sir Charles that there must be an inquest."

"Must there?" said Mrs. Brandon, with a well affected air of unconcern.

"Oh yes!" continued the female diplomat! "it's the law, when people die suddenly."

"Not always!" quietly answered the housekeeper; "for I have heard that when my lady's husband died there was no inquest—and his death was, I believe, a very sudden one!"

Again the complexion of Miss Tubby changed; but this time, instead of the ruddy hue of anger, it assumed a sickly, wax-like colour, which did not improve the appearance of Lady Briancourt's confidential attendant—whose influence over her mistress was as unbounded as it was unaccountable to all who knew the haughty, impatient disposition of the wealthy widow.

"I believe you were in the family when the late baronet died?" continued the speaker, without appearing to take the least notice of the singular effect her words had produced upon her visitor.

"Yes, yes—you know I was!"

"Died of apoplexy, I believe?" continued the querist.

"Yes, yes!"

"Found dead in his bed?"

"Don't speak of it!" exclaimed the waiting-maid, starting from her seat and walking towards the window, where she stood for some moments wiping away the drops of cold perspiration which stood upon her forehead. "I can't bear to hear him named!"

"Dear me! why not?" inquired her tormentor, with the most innocent air imaginable.

"It was I who first discovered him," replied the woman, hastily. "So good a master! I am sure his death nearly broke my poor lady's heart! She has never been happy since."

The old lady looked as if she really believed her.

"As the lawyer says," continued the speaker, "there must be an inquest. Of course," she added, "the servants will never be so foolish as to repeat any ridiculous ravings which the poor creature uttered in her madness; at least, I should hope not—it would not be to their interest!"

"Did my lady desire you to say so?" inquired the housekeeper.

"My lady, indeed!" repeated Miss Tubby, with a disdainful toss of her head; "do you suppose that my lady would trouble herself about any such folly? It is merely my own speculation."

"Which will doubtless be attended to!" observed Mrs. Brandon, rising to leave the room. "Your suggestions generally are—will hint as much to them."

No sooner was the waiting-maid left to herself, than she opened the door of the closet in which the liqueurs were kept, and half filled a tumbler with kirchenwasser, which she swallowed at a draught. Her features gradually recovered their usual expression of calm malignity.

"What a fool I am," she murmured, "to be startled by the gossip of an old fool who did not live with the family at the time, and has only heard—heard," she slowly repeated; "what has she heard? But it is like the world! The rich are sure to be slandered. Not that I have anything to fear, thank heaven!"

While thus soliloquising, Mr. Barnes had glided into the room, with his usual quiet step. When Miss Tubby turned and beheld him, with his keen, grey eyes fixed upon her, she started as if an adder had stung her. There was something in the old man's look which seemed to give the lie to her words: it was not the first time she had encountered the same menacing glance, and, without exactly knowing why, it terrified her.

"La, Barnes!" she said, "you steal about the house like a ghost!"

"Whose?" demanded the house-steward, in a quiet tone.

"Whose!" replied the waiting-maid; "why, any one's ghost!"

"Oh!"

"Whose should I mean?" she added, with desperate courage.

"You know best—perhaps Miss Clara's! She was no favourite of yours!"

"I defy your words, Mr. Barnes!" said the spinster, with a vivacity which showed how perfectly she had recovered her self-possession. "It was not my fault," she added, "if my lady disapproved of her running away with Mr. Stanley! I only did my duty!"

"And I must do mine!" observed the old man. "Sir Charles has directed the body of the unknown female, who so suddenly expired here last night, to be removed to the lodge. There is to be an inquest this time! Thank heaven," he added, "I did not see her die!"

Miss Tubby looked the speaker hard in the face, but not a muscle moved. The house-steward was one of those men whose countenances seldom betray their thoughts.

"Perhaps," she observed, with an air of indifference, "they may summon you to appear."

"Perhaps!"

"And if they do, what will you say?"

"The truth!" answered Barnes; "I never lie!"

Either the waiting-maid fancied the observation of the speaker was levelled at herself, or chose to take it—for she bounced out of the room with a disdainful toss of the head, muttering something about certain persons being in their dotage.

"Dotage!" repeated the old man; "time will show whether I doat or not."

In the course of the day, the inquest was held before the coroner from Colchester, and a jury composed entirely of the tenants of the Briancourt estates. By a singular coincidence, the summoning officer had picked out those who were in arrears with their rent.

Everything was passing to the satisfaction of Mr. Quirk, who anxiously watched the proceedings. The servants had been duly tutored. Not a word was said of the visit of Mabel, or the testimony she had borne to the identity of the poor, persecuted girl, who was styled in the proceedings as a female, name unknown. As they were drawing to a close, a noise was heard at the door of the room: it was occasioned by Mabel forcing her way through the crowd of tenants and servants, who vainly tried to impede her entrance. The poor, heart-broken mother had been absent from her home all the previous night, in search of her child, who had been so unaccountably taken from her. But her sorrows had not rendered her forgetful of the fidelity she had vowed to the dead.

"Make way!" she cried; "I will be heard! I have a right to be heard!"

"Silence in the court!" said the coroner.

"Keep that woman back!" whispered Mr. Quirk to one of the servants, at the same time turning very pale. "She is mad!"

Before the man could execute the order he had received, the landlady of the Travellers' Rest had forced her way through the crowd, and approached the table.

"You had better retire, my good woman!" observed the coroner.

"I shall not retire, sir!" answered Mabel, firmly, but respectfully. "I am here to speak the truth—God's holy truth—in face of those who would stifle it!"

Mr. Quirk began to look very uneasy. Approaching the unexpected witness, he tried to whisper something in her ear. She only partially caught his meaning—it was something about rent and money.

"Back, Judas!" she exclaimed. "I will not sell my soul for bread! Will you hear me, sir," she added, turning towards the coroner; "or must I go to Colchester, and make oath before the magistrates that the evidence I have to give has been wickedly stifled and rejected?"

"If you are determined," said the coroner, hesitatingly.

"I am determined! Worlds should not bribe me to conceal the truth."

Barnes, who was standing with several of the servants at the bottom of the room, nodded approvingly whilst the oath was being administered.

"Your name?" said the coroner.

"Mabel Cantor, sir."

The officer deliberately wrote it down; casting, as he did so, furtive glances at Mr. Quirk.

"Formerly," continued the witness, "waiting-maid to Miss Clara Briancourt—since Mrs. George Stanley—whose death you are here to inquire into."

"This is malice!" exclaimed the lawyer, with a malignant scowl; "rank malice! This woman was dismissed from the service of the family whose honour she would wound, for—for—" he hesitated; for once the lie was not ready to his lips—so he concluded by adding, "her vile and ungrateful conduct!"

"My good woman," said the coroner, in his most insinuating tone, "you must be mistaken!"

"Mistaken!" repeated Mabel, bursting into tears; "did I not live with her for years? Did she not come to my cottage a few hours before her death—drenched with the pitiless rain—starving—starving," she added, "and broken-hearted?"

"But Lady Briancourt would have recognised her?"

"She did, sir."

"Sir Charles, too? No, no—you must have been deceived!"

The faithful Mabel would not for an instant admit the possibility of such a supposition, but persisted in her former statement—relating everything which had passed at her cottage the previous day, except the trust reposed in her, and the oath she had taken.

Pity and indignation were depicted on every countenance, except those of the lawyer and the coroner. Even the servants, who had been schooled in the tale they were to tell, felt ashamed at having consented to repress the truth—so deep was the impression which the description Mabel gave of the sufferings and sorrows of her former mistress produced.

"Permit me to observe," said Mr. Quirk, "that this woman's evidence is entirely unsupported. I can prove that she has several times spoken of Sir Charles Briancourt and his mother with the most vindictive feeling."

The coroner shook his head—he was too respectable to risk his position and character any further.

"I shall certainly recommend," added the speaker, "my respected client to prosecute her for perjury—wilful and corrupt perjury!"

Mabel looked anxiously round the room: her eyes at last fell upon the impassible countenance of Mr. Barnes, who had been silently watching the proceedings.

"There is a witness!" she exclaimed; "one who well knows the truth of all I have stated!"

Every eye was turned upon the old man, who continued perfectly unmoved by the appeal.

After an approving nod from Mr. Quirk, who fancied that he could rely upon the house-steward—whose situation was most lucrative—the coroner directed him to be sworn.

"Now, sir," said that gentleman, as soon as the oath was administered, "were you present at the death of the deceased?"

"No."

"Have you seen the body since?"

"Yes."

"When?"

"When it was removed, by order of Sir Charles, from the hall to the lodge."

One or two of the more respectable tenants—who had paid their rents and had nothing to fear—muttered the word "Shame!"

"And did you, who have lived so long in the family," continued the coroner, "and must have known the daughter of your mistress from infancy, recognise it?"

"I did!"

"For whose?"

"For that of Mrs. George Stanley—formerly Miss Clara Briancourt—whom I have carried, when an infant, a hundred times in my arms!" replied the house-steward. "I knew it, despite the faded features, and the sad change which want and misery had wrought, by a scar upon the right shoulder, occasioned by a fall from a pony, in the long walk, when a girl. If I remember rightly," he added, "you, sir, attended her upon that occasion! I wonder you did not observe it!"

The coroner, who was a medical man, slightly changed colour—observing, that it was singular the circumstance should have escaped him.

In consequence of this additional testimony, it became necessary that the jury should once more view the body. Mabel, who accompanied them, would permit no hand but her own to turn down the sheet which covered it.

"There!" she said, pointing to the proof; "there is a witness which cannot lie—my dear, sweet young mistress! starved, persecuted to death, by her unnatural mother and selfish brother—aided," she added, at the same time pointing with a gesture of horror and contempt to the lawyer, "by that bad man!"

Mr. Quirk immediately took down her words, observing that they were actionable.

Although there was every inclination on the part both of the jury and coroner, to return such a verdict as might prove agreeable to the baronet and his haughty mother, the evidence was too strong for them. They felt that there was no getting over the testimony of Mr. Barnes. Still they stretched their complaisance as far as they could with safety, by finding "that the deceased, Clara Stanley, died from natural causes;" and then hastily dispersed, as if ashamed of their want of moral courage.

The verdict should have been, "from want of that bread which her hand, whilst living, had so often distributed to the poor!"

"God will avenge her in His own good time!" sobbed the faithful Mabel, as she stooped and imprinted, for the last time, a kiss upon the brow of her former mistress. "Her sufferings are over—those of her persecutors are to begin. Poor, blighted flower—the light of her old father's eyes—the joy of his kind heart—poor Mabel's only friend! cold—cold as my broken heart!"

"Get up!" exclaimed a harsh voice near her. "You have done mischief enough for one day!"

The unhappy woman rose from her knees—for she recognised the voice of her husband, who had been scouring the country in every direction, in search of their lost child.

"Meg—Meg!" she said, clasping her hands. "Oh, say that you have found her, Ned!"

"But I haven't found her!" answered the fellow, brutally. "I have been tramping about the woods all night! Had you kept to your home, instead of meddling in the affairs of your betters, she would not have been lost, and we should have secured a friend instead of an enemy. Find her," he added, "if you wish to pass a peaceful hour again!"

The look which accompanied this threat, made poor Mabel shudder.

"I will find her, Ned!" she eagerly replied; "believe me, I will! But don't strike me now! I can't bear it—indeed I cannot!"

The man replied only by an inarticulate growl; and the poor domestic slave, with a heavy heart, prepared to return with him to her home upon the heath—perfectly aware of the treatment she might expect when she arrived there.

Strange that man should choose for a mate something to tyrannise over and oppress—to exhaust his ill-humour on in secret—a sort of human conductor, to dissipate the spleen which cowardice or interest prevents his venting on his fellow-man! The inferior creation, as animals are unjustly called, might teach him a lesson.

"Nonsense!" some of our male readers will probably exclaim. "Is there not the law?" Of course there is—law for the blow—law for the broken limb; but where is the law for the broken heart—for the cold word, the bitter sneer, the daily outrage of unkind looks, which mock the sufferer's patience? There is none. She is his property—his slave.

In puritanical, Christian England, we affect to pity the women of the East, who are bought and sold in the public markets. But they at least possess one advantage over their sisters of Europe: their husbands treat them well—They know the price of them.

How often have we heard the careless, brutal husband observe: "Yes, Mary was a nice girl!" Was! Such men first uproot the flowers in their garden, and then complain that it is a desert.

When Quirk returned to the hall, and informed Sir Charles of the verdict of the jury, the rage of the baronet became furious. In the first transports of his passion, he ordered notice of ejectment to be served upon Ned Cantor, who was his tenant—vowing, with a bitter oath, that he would starve the rascal for not having taught his wife better.

"Mabel was not the only witness!" observed the lawyer.

"Who else?" demanded his furious client.

"Barnes, the house-steward."

"Barnes!" repeated Sir Charles, in a tone of astonishment; "the hypocritical, lying rascal! To turn like an adder, and sting the hand which fed him! The election coming on, too? Why, I shall be hooted from the hustings!"

His adviser shrugged his shoulders, to intimate that he thought such a circumstance not unlikely.

"At least," continued the speaker, "the authors of this precious mischief shall suffer for it! Barnes shall not sleep another night under this roof, I am determined!"

So saying, he rang the bell twice. In a few minutes the house-steward made his appearance, with his usual quiet demeanour.

"Did you ring, Sir Charles?" he inquired.

"I did ring!" replied the baronet, bursting with rage; "are your books made up?"

"You know," said the old man, respectfully, "that they are always made up!"

"Then leave my house at once—give your books to Mr. Quirk! He will check them, and pay any balance which may be due."

"Have you anything further to say, Sir Charles?" inquired Mr. Barnes, not in the least moved by his abrupt dismissal.

"No—only that you never sleep another night under this roof—that I am resolved on!"

"I shall not go!" replied the house-steward, firmly.

The lawyer and his client looked at each other in speechless indignation.

"From no love to you," continued the old man, "or respect to your service! I stay because it is my pleasure to stay! Whilst Lady Briancourt lives, this house is hers. If you wish for any further explanation, I refer you a once to her ladyship!"

So saying, he turned quietly upon his heel, and left the room.

"The insolent old rascal!" exclaimed the baronet, as soon as he had recovered from his surprise; "does he imagine that my mother will countenance him in his bravado? We shall see!"

"Better not be too impatient!" observed Mr. Quirk; "your mother sometimes takes strange fancies!"

"Ridiculous!"

"He has lived many years in the family."

"What of that?" demanded Sir Charles Briancourt; "does it give him licence to insult and brave me?"

"Certainly not; I merely thought—but you know best. Perhaps, after all, you had better see Lady Briancourt."

His client left the room, determined to have an explanation with his parent. It was not the first time he had wished to get rid of the house-steward, and been thwarted by his mother, whose haughty tone and manner invariably became kind and considerate when she addressed the steward of her dead husband.

"Barnes knows something!" murmured Mr. Quirk; "I am sure he does! and I would give a hundred—more, a thousand—to possess the clue! What can it be? Infidelity to the late baronet—eh? No! She has always been too proud for that! Her father's will? That could not have been tampered with, seeing that it disappointed her dearest wishes! I must find it out," he added; "then all will be easy!"

In about half an hour the baronet returned to the library, his countenance flushed with anger and mortification.

"Barnes does not leave?" observed the lawyer, with a smile.

"He does not," replied Sir Charles. "My mother's infatuation is unaccountable. But here she is mistress while she lives. I cannot contend against a will like hers!"

"I thought not!" muttered Mr. Quirk; "I thought not!" A few days afterwards, there was a pompous funeral at St. Botolph's. The body of the unfortunate Clara rested by the side of her father, in the family vault of the Briancourts. Her brother, clad in all the mockery of woe, followed the victim to her final resting-place. As he left the ruins of the old priory, where the ashes of many of the principal families of Essex repose, there was first a suppressed murmur amongst the crowd, then a groan, which rang for an hour afterwards in the ears of the unnatural brother.

CHAPTER V.

The aged wretch still sought for gold,
Base gain was all the miser's care.
He thought not once of growing old,
His hope, his fear, his heaven was there.

In the old town of Colchester, not far from the Church of St. John, there formerly stood a solitary mansion, the front of which was separated from the street by lofty walls, which, extending from wing to wing, formed a species of courtyard. The house, though fallen into decay, still bore traces of former respectability. There was a coat-of-arms, not inelegantly chiselled, over the principal entrance, and the coigns and lintels bore traces of having once been curiously carved. Most of the windows, at the period we are writing of, were closely boarded up, to avoid the tax. So desolate was the place, that even the neighbours would have deemed it uninhabited, had not, on rare occasions, a thin, curling smoke been seen to rise, as if it were ashamed of itself, from the tall stack of chimneys.

This house had for many years been tenanted by one Nicholas Arden and his daughter.

Although immensely rich—for the old man held mortgages upon half the estates in the county—he denied himself not merely the necessities of life, but the attendance of servants: the household work and the cooking—such as it was—were done by his daughter Alice—a fair, beautiful girl—who never quitted the house, unless to visit the neighbouring church, where she always went alone—her father never accompanying her.

A poor, half-starved boy, named Goliath Obie, whom Mr. Arden had taken from the poor-house, as a drudge, was the only inmate of the house besides himself and Alice.

The truth was, that Nicholas Arden was a miser. To his ears there was no music like the chink of gold. He lived upon the sound—it was his idol—for his heart had never known any other worship. If he loved his daughter, it was because she was his—a species of property—something that belonged to him: and upon everything that did belong to him, the old man set a certain value.

Although Alice Arden was remarkably beautiful, her features bore that resigned and hopeless expression which marks the countenances of those who have never known the joys of childhood. From infancy she had been both motherless and companionless. In her tenderest years the merry laugh had been a stranger to her lips—her whole existence had hitherto resembled that of those wondrous recluses which are sometimes found imbedded in the block of marble—dull, cheerless, hopeless—almost senseless.

The snow was falling fast, and the sleet which mingled with it beat with a sharp sound against the creaked panes of glass in the only window which had not been boarded up, in what was once the drawing-room of the mansion. This window had strong iron shutters, which the miser never failed every night to close and bolt with his own hands before he slept.

There was neither fire in the wide, gaping grate, nor a carpet on the floor—and yet winter had set in with more than usual rigour. The furniture of the apartment consisted of several oaken chairs, and a sofa to match, covered with faded tapestry. Directly opposite the window was a quaintly-carved cabinet, iron-bound, and guarded by a massive lock: it contained the title deeds of many a fair estate—the bonds of the spendthrift heir, and needy merchant: all who wanted money in the good town of Colchester, and had security to offer, came to the miser for assistance. Once in his grasp, few ever were known to extricate themselves; ruin followed them like their shadows.

Nicholas Arden was seated at a long table, covered with deeds and papers. He was a tall, spare man, between sixty and seventy years of age. His eye had all the fierceness of the vulture's—to which rapacious bird his aquiline nose gave him a fanciful resemblance. He was attired in a loose dressing-gown, which Alice had made for him out of one of the faded curtains of the drawing-room—and to keep his long, grey locks from straying into his eyes, he wore a black skull-cap on his head.

The old man was busily employed in counting a large sum in gold—which he dropped piece by piece into an iron casket which stood upon the table. How his eyes sparkled as he listened to the chink of the yellow metal! The voice of love never spoke to his withered heart so eloquently. Whenever he met with a coin of unusual brightness, he gloated over it like some ardent lover gazing upon the portrait of his mistress; toyed with it, by balancing it upon the tip of his long, bony finger, to ascertain that it was full weight—then dropped it, with a sigh of satisfaction, to rejoin its fellows. Thrice had he counted them over: not one was wanting to complete the number. As he closed the lid of the casket, which shut with a spring, he began to sniff the air and knit his bushy eyebrows close together; for, like the carrion-bird to which we before compared him, he had a keen scent.

"More extravagance!" he muttered; "that girl will ruin me!"

This exclamation was occasioned, not, as our readers might suppose, by any savoury odours rising from the kitchen, which was situated directly under the apartment in which the speaker sat, but from the circumstance of a thin, vapourish smoke issuing from the unswept chimney of the drawing-room. He knew that his daughter Alice had ventured to light a fire in the chamber below.

"What if the glass does stand at freezing point?" he added; "she might keep herself warm with exercise! There will be sad waste when I am gone—sad waste!"

Finding that the smoke increased rather than diminished, he opened the door of the drawing-room, and, advancing to the head of the staircase, called several times, in a loud, angry tone

"Alice, Alice!"

"Coming, father" replied soft, silvery voice from below.

In a few moments his daughter made her appearance, bearing a small tray, on which was a basin containing a thin, watery broth.

"What is this?" demanded the miser, with a look of horror.

"It will do you good, father," answered the poor girl. "For several days past you have been ill—very ill—scarcely broken your fast—and—"

"And where did you get the meat?" interrupted the old man, sharply. "I shall be ruined—beggared, by such extravagance!"

"Eat, and never mind where it came from, so that it came honestly!"

"Honestly!" repeated her parent. "Have you robbed me, Jezabel?"

"Heaven forgive you, father, for that thought!" exclaimed Alice, with dignity. "Since I must tell you—when Sir Charles called yesterday respecting the mortgages, he threw me a crown piece. Doubtless he took me for your servant."

"So much the better, Alice!" said the miser, somewhat mollified. "I would not have my child dressed like a painted butterfly! And so he gave thee a crown piece—eh?"

"Yes."

"And how much hast thou spent of it?"

"Nearly two shillings, father."

"Two shillings! Two shillings, in one day! The wealth of India would not support such extravagance! Oh, my gold—my precious gold—gained with so much toil and pains! What will become of it when I am gone? Thou shouldst have given it to me," he added, "and I would have paid thee interest for it—that is, legal interest!"

Alice made no reply, but silently drew the little tray opposite to where he was seated. As the savoury steam greeted his senses, he became somewhat less irascible.

"Well—well!" he muttered; "as the meat is bought, and I do not feel quite well, it would be a sin to waste it! but no more such extravagance, Alice, as thou vauest my blessing! And see," he added, "that Goliath does not steal any of the meat: that boy has a stomach like the maw of death—there is no filling it!"

His daughter received the reproof and caution submissively, and sat contentedly watching the old man, as he indulged in the unusual luxury of a meal. As he concluded, a loud rapping was heard at the door.

"See who it is," he said, "and let me know before you admit any one."

Alice left the room.

"A good girl!" muttered the miser; "but does not understand the value of money—that a penny is the seed of a pound—the pound the seed of hundreds—thousands! Had I my life to commence again, what could I not achieve with my present knowledge? I shall die poor," he added, with a sigh; "very poor!"

By way of commentary on his assertion, he lifted the iron casket which contained his gold, and, staggering under the weight, placed it in the old oaken cabinet—the doors of which he carefully locked, and thrust the key into his bosom—nearest his heart. He liked to feel it there.

His daughter returned and informed him, that Mr. Quirk wished to see him.

After carefully looking round to ascertain that no paper, coin, or bond had been left upon the table, the miser directed that he should be admitted.

"Well, Mr. Arden," said the lawyer, as soon as he had closed the door of the room, "I have come for your answer. Are we to have the money?"

"Money!" repeated the old man, testily; "every one comes to me for money! I have none—scarcely enough to keep life and body together!"

Mr. Quirk smiled incredulously. It was not his first visit to the miser.

"This is childish folly!" he replied. "Your answer. With our securities, we need not go begging in the market."

"This was true."

"It is a large sum—a very large sum!" observed Nicholas Arden; "twenty thousand pounds!"

"The rental is eight thousand a year!" was the rejoinder.

"And when did you say you must have it?"

"In ten days."

"Well—well!" said the old man, with a groan; "tell Sir Charles that I will pleasure him. Draw up the deeds, and when they are signed, the money shall be counted down. Where do we meet?"

"At the post-house on the heath," replied the lawyer. "My client would not have his mother suspect such a transaction for the world! You will bring the money with you?"

"I will pay it into the bank," replied Nicholas Arden, suspiciously; "it might be dangerous to travel with so large a sum."

"It seems to me," observed Mr. Quirk—first rubbing his hands with considerable satisfaction at having completed a long-pending arrangement—"that you have not exactly that sort of confidence, my dear sir, which ought to exist between gentlemen of our standing and yourself!"

"Very likely not!" was the blunt rejoinder. "I trust no one, and cannot be deceived!"

"This is positively unamiable!"

"Look ye!" said the miser; "I know my fellow-creatures. They are like wolves, seeking whom they may devour—hungry and greedy!"

"Not all men, Mr. Arden, surely?"

"All!" continued the man of gold. "At least all that I have ever dealt with! Sir Charles Briancourt destroyed his sister that he might inherit her wealth; and her mother cast her off, that she might gratify her revenge upon the son of the man who slighted and scorned her; you pandered to your client's vices and necessities, and when you had him securely in your power, forced him into a secret marriage with your daughter—to ennoble her!" he added, with a chuckle; "ennoble her!"

"How know you that?" demanded his visitor, turning exceedingly pale—for he well knew the consequence, should the haughty Lady Briancourt discover the unequal alliance which her son had been betrayed into.

"I know many things!" was the dry rejoinder.

"Of course you will be secret?"

"As long as the interest of my money is duly paid," replied the money-lender; "I meddle not in such matters. To the very day, the sum your client requires shall be ready. I will not fail you!"

So saying, the miser rose to conduct his visitor from the house.

Mr. Quirk begged that he would spare himself the unnecessary trouble; adding, that "he knew the way."

"Possibly!" was the ungracious observation of Nicholas Arden; "but you are one of those visitors whom I prefer seeing from my house myself!"

CHAPTER VI.

Around it twined in many wreath
The nightshade dank, the deadly yew;
Poisoning the hurtless flower beneath,
Which under its cold shadow grew.

ALTHOUGH more than a month had elapsed since the abduction of the two children from the Travellers' Rest, and both Ned and Mabel had traversed the country in every direction, no tidings of them could be obtained. The house—which it had formerly been the pride of the bereaved mother to keep clean and neat—was neglected; and the garden, left uncultivated by her husband, soon became, from the rank nature of the soil, overrun with noisome weeds. The natural consequence was, that their business fell off—especially as it was generally known to all the country that they had fallen under the baronet's displeasure, and received notice to quit—which circumstance bettered neither their condition nor reputation.

Mabel had suffered much. Ned, whose temper had never been one of the best, was continually reproaching her for the loss of his child; and when maddened by drink, blows were added to unkind words. The poor, suffering creature bore them patiently. She felt them more upon her heart than upon her body. The former was almost broken.

Sometimes Ned would be absent for whole days, in company with a wild, reckless youth, known by the name of Black Will, whose acquaintance he had lately made. Reports of robberies, too, became frequent, and Lenden Heath obtained an evil name. This latter circumstance occasioned Mabel many hours of painful reflection. She could not account for the means by which her husband contrived to indulge his growing passion for drink; added to which, he had lately bought a new coat and gun.

"Where could he get the money?" she mentally asked, and as frequently shuddered at the reply which suggested itself.

One evening Mabel was seated alone, by the fire in her desolate cottage, brooding over her sorrows, when the latch was raised, and the gaunt form of the miser, carefully enveloped in a faded cloak, strode into the kitchen.

"Bless me!" she exclaimed, starting from her reverie; "Mr. Arden!"

"Humph! so you know me?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, then," said the old man, sharply, "that being the case, you can have no hesitation in accommodating me with a bed for the night. I am to meet Sir Charles Briancourt to-morrow, by ten o'clock, at the post-house. I should have slept there, had the rascally landlord been reasonable; but he wanted half a crown for a room. Half a crown!" he repeated; "all I had about me! What do you charge?"

"A shilling, sir."

"And enough, too!" was the reply.

Seating himself at the table, Nicholas Arden—the possessor of countless thousands—drew from his pocket a mouldy crust of bread and a hard-boiled egg—for he was far too economical to pay for a supper when travelling; and, requesting Mabel to give him a glass of water and a little salt, commenced eating his evening repast.

"You keep a good fire here!" he observed; "though, if you charge a shilling for a bed, you can afford to do so!"

"It is not many travellers that we have now."

"Ah! the times are hard?"

"Very hard!" replied the hostess, wiping away a tear.

"I find them so," continued the old man. "Pay! pay! my hand is never out of my pocket—the world is always robbing me! Not that," he added, with a hypocritical sigh, "I have much to lose!"

Despite her grief, Mabel could scarcely suppress a smile. From childhood she had been accustomed to hear people talk of the rich miser of Colchester, who was supposed to have more gold in his possession than both the banks in the town contained.

Although the monstrous charge of half a crown for a bed had been one of the motives which induced Nicholas Arden to pass the night at the Travellers' Rest, instead of the post-house, it had not been the only one. Rumours had reached him of the extraordinary disappearance of two children—one of which, it was whispered, was the granddaughter of Lady Briancourt—and he determined to ascertain the truth from the lips of Mabel herself.

His reasons for wishing to do so were plain enough. The existence of such a child, and her claims to Broadlands, affected the value of the securities on which he had advanced the large sum of twenty thousand pounds.

"My good woman," he began, in a soft tone of voice—for he could be very kind in words upon occasion—they cost him nothing—"you must be very lonely here?"

"At times, very, sir!"

"Have you no husband?"

"Yes—yes!" answered Mabel; "but he is absent: he—he works at a distance!"

"Any children?"

"God only can tell," exclaimed the bereaved mother, bursting into tears, "whether I have a child or not! I had one, sir—a fairy, joyous thing—the solace of my existence! but she was taken from me—stolen about a month ago—and I have had a weight at my heart ever since!"

"It is true, then!" thought the old man; then, speaking aloud, he continued: "Was she stolen alone?"

"No!" answered Mabel, with a look of surprise; "the child of a dear friend was taken with her! Oh, sir," she added, struck by a sudden hope, "if you have any clue, in mercy give it me! Feel for a mother's agony! I will bless you—pray for you! Can you give me any tidings of my little one?"

"No!"

"Any of the child who was stolen with her?"

"Not at present," replied the miser, cautiously; "I must first know the name of her parents."

"There needs no secrecy," said Mabel; "it was the granddaughter of Lady Briancourt—the child of my former mistress, Mrs. Stanley!"

"Formerly Miss Clara Briancourt?"

"Even so!"

"Tell me," continued the querist, in his most insinuating manner, "was she really married to Mr. Stanley?"

"Really married!" repeated Mabel, with indignation; "I could as soon doubt heaven as her unsullied purity!"

"Where—where?" eagerly demanded the old man, at the same time drawing his chair closer to her side.

"That," replied the woman, for the first time struck by the suspicion that his questions were prompted by something more than curiosity, "I cannot tell you, sir—for I did not accompany her in her flight from the hall—I remained behind, to avoid suspicion; and I never saw my dear lady afterwards, till the day she died—and then for a few minutes!"

Mr. Arden threw himself back in his chair, satisfied that he had gleaned from the hostess all she knew, and sat for some time musing over the intelligence. Once or twice a quiet smile played upon his thin lips—then disappeared like a fleeting shadow; at last he requested to be shown to his bed.

Mabel took the candle from the table, and conducted him to the best room in the house.

"There is no bolt to the door!" observed the miser, uneasily, after having taken a survey of the apartment.

"There is little need," she replied; "though poor, I am honest!"

"Humph!" growled the old man; "maybe! But it signifies little—I have nothing to lose! Good night!"

"Good night, sir!"

With these words she left him to repose, and returned to the kitchen, to await the arrival of her husband.

She had not long to wait before Ned made his appearance—half drunk, as usual. Black Will accompanied him—both appeared to have been walking very quickly.

"Any one here?" demanded Ned, in a tone which sent the blood to the heart of his wife.

"Yes—a traveller."

"I know—old Arden, the miser?"

"You would not harm him, Ned?" exclaimed the terrified Mabel.

"Harm him!" repeated her husband, with an oath; "what should I harm him for? He never did me any injury! What folly will you get into your head next, I wonder? I shall not stop long enough to harm any one," he added; "Will and I are about to try the warren. If we have any luck, we will bring you half a score of rabbits by breakfast time."

This was a positive relief to Mabel. For once she rejoiced in the absence of her husband and his dissolute companion.

Shortly afterwards they took their leave, repeating their intention to try the warren.

"Strange—very strange!" murmured the unhappy woman, as soon as she was alone, "that Ned should return, and leave again so suddenly! Should he—but no—the idea is too terrible! I will not wrong the father of my child by such a thought!"

So saying, she carefully fastened the door of her cottage, and retired to the little chamber at the back—but not to rest. Strange thoughts came over her, and sad presentiments. There was an oppression at her heart—a choking sensation at her throat. Although the night was a cold one, she opened the casement to breathe the air—fancying that it might revive her.

Her eyes glanced over the heath, and she distinctly recognised the figures of her husband and Black Will stealing round the hedge which skirted the garden, towards the back of the house. In an instant their intention flashed upon her. It was to rob—perhaps murder—her guest.

"God help me!" she exclaimed; "for what misery am I reserved? Ned shall not commit this crime, if I can prevent it!"

Gently closing the window, Mabel, scarcely aware of her purpose, crept to the chamber of the miser. The old man slept; his dream, most likely, was of his gold—for one long, bony hand clutched the pillow with a vulture-like grasp; the other was buried beneath the clothes.

"Perhaps I may be deceived!" thought Mabel; "he cannot be so lost! At least I'll watch till morning."

She had not long to wait—the sickening presentiment was soon confirmed: the window of the room gently opened—and the wretched wife, who had concealed herself behind the great oaken chair, saw her husband enter the room.

THE WOMEN OF SPAIN.

On the Alameda, or public walk of Malaga, such a variety of colours meet and dazzle the eye, as to make the stranger at once conclude that, whatever attractive qualities Spanish women may possess, taste in dress cannot be considered among them. The most striking novelty, on first landing in Spain, is the mantilla, or black veil, which is generally worn, although here and there bonnets are creeping in, and Spanish women are sacrificing the only becoming peculiarity they have left, in order to imitate the fashions of their neighbours. There is an elegance and a dressy appearance about the mantilla which create surprise at its not having been adopted by other nations; and if Spaniards could only be made to feel how unbecoming bonnets are to them—the rich masses of whose splendid hair prevent the bonnet being properly worn—they would cherish the mantilla, as conferring on them a peculiar charm, in which they are safe to fear no rivals.

I know that I shall be accused of insensibility and want of taste, when I confess that my first disappointment on landing in Spain, was the almost total absence of beauty amongst the Spanish women. Poets have sung of Spain's "dark, glancing daughters," and travellers have wandered through the country with minds so deeply impressed with the preconceived idea of the beauty of the women, that they have found them all their imaginations so fondly pictured; and in their works have fostered, what I cannot help maintaining is a mere delusion—one of the many in which people still indulge, when they think and dream of Spain.

The women of Spain have magnificent eyes, beautiful hair, and generally fine teeth; but more than that cannot be said by those who are content to give an honest and candid opinion. I have rarely seen one whose features could be called strictly beautiful, and that bewitching grace and fascination about their figures and their walk which they formerly possessed, have disappeared with the high comb which supported the mantilla, and the narrow basquina—which gave a peculiar character to their walk. With the change in their costume, those distinctive charms have vanished. The gaudy colours which now prevail have destroyed the elegance that always accompanied black, in which alone, some years since, a lady could appear in public. No further proof of this is required than to see the same people at church, where black is considered indispensable, and on the Alameda, with red dresses and yellow shawls, or some colours equally gaudy, and combined with as little regard to taste.

Although I have not yet discovered the beauty of Spanish women, I must say that the Malaguenians are fairly entitled, in all that does exist, to dispute the palm with the inhabitants of any other town we have visited.

There are some very pretty faces, and very characteristic of the Spanish countenance. They are generally very dark, and almost all have that peculiar projecting brow which gives to the face quite a character of its own.

The women have a universal custom of putting fresh flowers in their hair. It strikes one much, upon first arriving, to see those of every class, even the poorest, with some flower or another most gracefully placed in their rich black hair; the beauty of which is not a little enhanced by the bright red rose or snowy jessamine, contrasting so well with their raven tresses. The hair is generally worn plain—curls being seldom seen, for they do not suit the mantilla; and if flowers cannot be procured, some bright ribbon is invariably worn as a substitute. The love of brilliant and showy colours appearing to form a ruling passion in the present day, offers a singular contrast to the fashion twenty years ago—when a lady who would have ventured into the street dressed in anything but black, would have been mobbed and insulted by the people. Our first visit to the theatre at Malaga confirmed my impressions of the exaggerated accounts generally given of Spanish beauty.—Lady Louisa Tenison's Castile and Andalusia.

THE FEMALE ATTIRE OF THE PRESENT DAY.

It is upon the whole in as favourable a state as the most vehement advocates for what is called nature and simplicity could desire. It is a costume in which they can dress quickly, walk nimbly, eat plentifully, stoop easily, lol gracefully, and, in short, perform all the duties of life without let or hindrance. The head is left to its natural size, the skin to its natural purity, the waist at its proper region, the heels at their real level. The dress is one calculated to bring out the natural beauties of the person, and each of them has, as far as we can see, fair play. In former days what was known of a woman's hair in the cap of Henry VIII.'s time—or of her forehead under her hair in George III.'s time—or of the fall of the shoulders under a welt or wing in Queen Elizabeth's time—or of the slenderness of her throat in a gorget of Edward I.'s time—or of the shape of her arm in a great bishop sleeve—even in our own time? Nowadays all these points receive full satisfaction for past neglect, and a woman breaks upon us in such a plenitude of charms that we hardly know where to begin the catalogue. Hair light as silk in floating curls, or massive as marble in shining coils. Forehead bright and smooth as mother-of-pearl, and arched in matchless symmetry by its own beautiful drapery. Ear, which for centuries had lain concealed, set on the side of the head like a delicate shell. Throat a lovely stalk, leading the eye upward to a lovelier flower, and downward along a fair, sloping ridge, undulating in the true line of beauty, to the polished precipice of the shoulder, whence, from the pendent calyx of the shortest possible sleeve, hangs a lovely branch, smooth and glittering like pale pink coral, slightly curved towards the figure, and terminating in five taper petals, pinker still, folding and unfolding "at their own sweet will," and specially contrived by Nature to pick your heart clean to the bone before you know what they are about.—Music, and the Art of Dress.

AN ECCENTRIC PUBLICAN.—Towards the close of the last century, there lived in Kidderminster an eccentric person of the name of Orton (not that Orton, the friend of Doddridge, who passed some time in the town, but "Job Orton," the landlord of the Bell Inn). During his life-time he erected his tomb in the parish churchyard, with this memento-mori inscription, graven in large characters on the upper slab:

Job Orton, a man from Leicestershire;

And when he's dead, he must lie under here

This inscription remains unaltered to this day, and may be seen on the right hand of the broad walk on the north side of the spacious churchyard. His coffin was constructed at the same time; and, until it should be required for other and personal purposes, was used as a wine-bin. But, to carry his eccentricity even to the grave, he left strict orders that he should be buried in an erect posture; and tradition (of course) says, that his request was complied with. Your correspondent says that tradition assigns no reason for the peculiarity of the Harcourt knight's burial; but tradition has been more explicit in Job Orton's case, whose reason (?) for his erect posture in the tomb was, that at the last day he might be able to rise from his grave before his wife, who was buried in the usual horizontal manner. Job Orton appears to have had a peculiar talent for the composition of epitaphs; as, in his more playful moments, he was accustomed to tell his better half that if he outlived her he should put the following lines on her tombstone:

Esther Orton—a bitter, sour weed;

God never lov'd her, nor increased her seed.

He seems, however, to have spared her this gratuitous insult. As a further illustration of the character of this singular couple, the following anecdote is told. Esther Orton having frequently declared that she should never die happy until she had rolled in riches, Job, like a good husband, determined to secure his wife's happiness. Having sold some land for a thousand pounds, he insisted that the money should be paid wholly in guineas. Taking these home in a bag, he locked his wife up in a room, knocked her down, opened his bag of guineas, and, raining the golden wealth upon her, rolled his Danae over and over in the coin. "And now, Esther," said Job Orton, "thee mayst die as soon as thee pleases, for thee'st had thy wish, and rolled in riches."—Notes and Queries.

[HINDOOS PERFORMING VOWS MADE TO THE GODDESS KALEE.]

HINDOOS PROPITIATING THE GODDESS KALEE.

THE Hindoo mythology has been well described as a mixture of sublime truths, wild fictions, and the most degrading superstitions. In its higher attributes it inculcates doctrines of which Christians cordially approve, but its lower manifestations and barbarous discipline put a slime on all its beauty, and impart to the whole scheme a distorted and hideous appearance. The idea of Brahma as the Supreme Being, is a lofty one, but in the character of a destroyer, the doctrines of the followers of the Pagan deity become horribly repulsive. Juggernaut puts quite an extinguisher on the glory of Vishnu the Preserver.

However, the deified philosopher must not be held responsible for the conduct of the inferior divinities who have been grouped around him.

Some Hindoos still adore the sun, under the name of Surya; others offer up their vows to Sieva, the Destroyer; others to Yamen, the God of Death; some to Cama, the God of Love; to Suradeir, the Goddess of Wine; and some to Kallee, the very lowest idea of power in the whole system. Kallee represents rapine, slaughter, cruelty, and crime. And here we may certainly be allowed to remark, that in all the mythologies extant, a woman is introduced as the principal symbol of sin, or as the first cause of sin and woe. The heathens, in the estimation of philosophers, were, no doubt, wiser men than the frenzied champions of women in the present day. Be that as it may—we have certainly an opinion of our own on the subject, which we reserve for a more suitable occasion—we say, be the philosophic fraternity right or wrong, it speaks eloquently in favour of the Divine origin of the Christian scheme of religion, that it was the first and last to clothe woman in the attributes of good—to make her a ministering angel, instead of a demon—the mother of hope and salvation, not the daughter of Satan and destruction.

The Hindoo mythology repudiates—or is incapable of entertaining—this divine revelation; and, accordingly, it presents us with ideas of all kinds of wickedness in the form of a woman. Kallee is one of these infernal incarnations; and her image is that of a very ugly woman, with a black face, skull chaplet, and many hands. The period of her reign on earth has been fixed by the Hindoos at three thousand years. Poets, in their allusions to her, are justifiably fierce. One of them apostrophises her as the Dark goddess of the azure flood,

Whose robes are wet with infant tears
Skull-chaplet wearer, whom the blood
Of man delights three thousand years.

Dark, indeed, when all over India there are traditions that, in ancient times, at particular shrines, a man was sacrificed to her every day. A goat was afterwards substituted, and the custom is observed in many places in Bengal and Western India to this very day.

Clothed with such attributes, it is not surprising that Kallee should find favour in the eyes of thieves, murderers, and the scum of Hindoo society. In Bengal she has been elected the especial patron of thieves; she is the presiding divinity over theft. The timid and the ferocious also hold her in high esteem, and make vows to her, and perform them with punctilious regularity.

Our illustration represents a scene of this kind, at which the artist was present. The tortures inflicted by and on the devotees were disgustingly horrible. Bishop Heber graphically describes one of these Hindoo profanations of both soul and body:

"We were awakened," says the bishop, "before day-break, by the discordant sounds of native musical instruments: we immediately mounted our horses, and rode to the Meidan. The crowd was great and very picturesque. The music consisted chiefly of large double drums, ornamented with plumes of black feathers, like those of a hearse, which rose considerably higher than the heads of the persons who played on them; large crooked trumpets, like the litui of the ancients; and small gongs suspended from a bamboo, which rested on the shoulders of two men, the last of whom played on them with large, thick, and heavy drum-sticks, or cudgels. All the persons who walked in the procession, and a large majority of the spectators, had their faces, bodies, and white cotton clothes daubed all over with vermillion: the latter to a degree which gave them the appearance of being actually dyed rose-colour. They were also crowned with splendid garlands of flowers, with girdles and baldrics of the same. Many trophies and pageants of different kinds were paraded up and down, by stages drawn by horses or bullocks. Some were mythological, others were imitations of different European figures, soldiers, ships, &c.; and, in particular, there was one very large model of a steam-boat. The devotees went about with small spears through their tongues and arms, and still more with hot irons pressed against their sides. All were naked to the waist, covered with flowers, and plentifully raddled with vermillion, while their long, black, wet hair hung down their backs, almost to their loins. From time to time, as they passed us, they laboured to seem to dance; but, in general, their step was slow, their countenances expressive of resigned and patient suffering, and there was no appearance, that I saw, of anything like frenzy or intoxication. The peaceableness of the multitude was also as remarkable as its number. This is one of their most famous festivals, and the people had assembled from all the neighbouring villages. The noise of the music continued till about noon, when the devotees retired to heal their wounds. These are said to be dangerous, and occasionally to prove fatal. One of our servants, a musalchee, or torch-bearer, of the lowest caste (for it seems that none of a higher sort practise these cruelties), ran about the house with a small spear through his tongue, begging money from his fellow-servants. This man appeared stupefied with opium, which, I am told, is generally taken by these poor wretches, to deaden their feelings; and the parts through which the spears are thrust, are said to be previously rubbed for a considerable time, till numbness ensues.

"In the evening, the bishop walked to the Boitaconnah—the part of the city where the trees for swinging are erected: they are not suffered to be placed near the European residences. He arrived in time to be a spectator of the whole ceremony. The victim was led, covered with flowers, and without any apparent reluctance, to the foot of the tree; hooks were then thrust through the muscles of his sides, which he endured without shrinking, and a broad bandage was fastened round his waist, to prevent the hooks from being torn through by the weight of his body. He was then raised up, and whirled round; at first the motion was slow, but by degrees was increased to considerable rapidity. In a few minutes it ceased, and the by-standers were going to let him down, when he made signs that they should proceed: this resolution was received with great applause by the crowd, and, after drinking some water, he was again spun round."

The British government in India have exerted themselves to the utmost to suppress these barbarous exhibitions; but their efforts have hitherto been only attended with a very small amount of success. The Hindoos are so wedded to their customs, that they cling to them with vice-like tenacity; and it is the deliberately-expressed opinion of persons acquainted with their dogged persistency of character—the result of an hereditary training more than two thousand years old—that it will take many generations before the mass of the population can be brought to accept and accommodate themselves to those liberal and elevating conceptions of human nature which speedily root out the ideas and habits inspired by the belief in such a monstrous being as the goddess Kallee.

A D R I E N N E

A ROMANCE OF SAVOY.

CHAPTER I.

In the early years of the present century, two millers had established themselves in the beautiful vale of Chamouni, which, with a rivalry of pursuits and similarity of interests, was almost sure to produce envy, hatred, and malice. On one side, at least, these results were decided and violent.

Gabriel Balmat, the occupant of the dwelling whose crumbling ruins are now the only visible records of his existence, was a man of dark and gloomy character. Unmated and solitary in the world, he had no check, in domestic associations, to the baneful passions of an ill-regulated mind. He was poor, and had from early youth maintained a hard struggle against fate. But there was neither dignity nor virtue in the contest. He worked his way through life in bitterness and shadow, finding congenial associations in the desolate rocks and glaciers, and seeking none with any of his own species, beyond what was prescribed by the actual necessities of his calling.

The evil disposition of this unhappy man was chiefly excited against his rival in trade, Jean Carrier, who was, even earlier than he, established in the mill that was his father's before him: so that Balmat had really no excuse, much less a justification, for his enmity. The man he hated so much was simple and honest in his manners and dealings; a fair competitor in a business which afforded ample employment for two persons, and a fair chance of respectable provision for at least two families.

It was not, however, wonderful, that the amiable and kindly bearing of Carrier made him the favourite with the small farmers and peasantry. Nothing "brings grist to the mill," literally or by analogy, so much as an easy temper and a mild disposition. The consequence, in the present instance, was, that the possessor of these happy qualities had generally more corn to grind than his hopper could accommodate—that his wife and children were well dressed, and his little household in a state of great comfort; while his unpopular neighbour got but little employment, and was continually forced to expend his indifferent profits in law-suits with those customers whom he was so much in the habit of ill-treating and quarrelling with. The vexations and injuries he on many occasions caused to poor Carrier and his property, were considerable. But the latter never would follow the example of others, by retaliating or going to law—trusting to his own industry to repair the mischief, and benevolently hoping for a change of character in his disagreeable and dangerous neighbour.

The wisdom of this conduct was in some measure justified by the result; for in the course of time a feeling did accidentally rise up in the breast of Gabriel, which, if it did not altogether change his disposition, at least modified it in some measure, in respect to its injurious effects upon the interests of the Carrier family.

It happened one morning, early, that "the repulsive personage" who is the hero of this story, was taking a solitary walk up that side of the Arve—the little river that waters the valley of Chamouni—on which his own mill and dwelling-house were situate, his mind fixed, as usual, on some project of ill, or occupied with some reflection of discomfort, when his attention was suddenly attracted to a group of children on the opposite bank, whom he at once recognised as the junior branches of the Carrier family.

He had never before been so near those young creatures, for they had such an extreme dread of him, that they on all possible occasions avoided his neighbourhood. He now stood gazing at them with folded arms and scowling aspect: at sight of those living reproaches to his misanthropy and malice, his bad feelings were still more excited, and they at length arose to absolute fury, on observing that, as soon as the children saw him, they fled towards their home, uttering piercing screams, and throwing behind them looks of terror. The first impulse of his passion made him also run in the same direction, shouting and uttering imprecations, so as to increase their fright; and at last one of the little urchins—a mere infant—was tripped up by a stone on the path, and it fell headlong from the bank into the stream. Shallow as it was, there was quite water enough to drown a child of that helpless age; and such might have been the fate of the little victim, had Balmat left it to itself. But, urged by his impetuous temper, and acting from impulse more than design, he rushed into the river, over the rocky impediments, and was just within arm's length of the struggling innocent, and on the point of either plunging it deeper into the water and so suffocating it, or raising it up to dash it to certain death against the granite blocks around, when he was arrested in time to save him from the commission of this ferocious and cowardly crime.

It was no stalwart arm which seized on his—no powerful man who threw himself, shield-like, before the helpless object of his rage. It was only a little girl of about thirteen years old, the eldest sister of the child, who, while her two younger brothers continued their flight towards home, had intrepidly stopped on her path, and immediately ran into the water, to interpose between the double death which seemed to menace her little sister—heedless of the risk she herself ran of sharing her fate.

"Oh, sir, kill me—kill me! but not little Josephine—that would break my mother's heart!" cried the pale and agitated girl, piteously looking towards Balmat's terrible countenance, while her hands were employed in raising the child from its perilous position.

Almost every mind does homage to the quality of courage. None more so than those in which it degenerates into ferocity. If all people knew this well, in many trying scenes they would seem to be brave, even if they were not so. In the instance now before us the cruel Balmat was struck with astonishment and admiration, little common to one so generally insensible to sudden emotions. The boldness of this girl—herself a mere child—in rushing to what she evidently believed a self-sacrifice to save her sister's life and her mother's feelings, appeared to him an act of such sublimity, that even the callous heart of Gabriel the Cruel, as he was usually called, was touched by it in a way unknown to him before.

"No; I'll not kill either you or her!" said he, with a grim smile, as he took the children one in each hand, and helped them out of the water. And as he lifted them up the bank, he asked the eldest what was her name.

"Adrienne Carrier!" replied she, firmly, yet turning towards home, as though unwilling to trust herself longer in such doubtful company.

"You are afraid of me?" said Balmat.

"Not for myself, but for my little sister, sir!" answered Adrienne.

"You know me, then? Who am I?"

"The wicked miller of Chamouni, sir!"

Balmat could not help laughing at the candour and the civility combined in this rough answer. But before he could continue the conversation, his attention was attracted to the approach of a group from the rival mill, consisting of Carrier, his wife, and two men-servants, who had hastened on hearing the screams of the runaway children, and now rapidly approached with menacing air.

Balmat, having quite recovered his calmness, proceeded to ascend the broken and rocky bank, helping up his dripping companions; and as he reached the level ground, the hostile group arrived on the spot. The children immediately disengaged themselves from his hold, and rushed into the open arms of their parents, both of whom anxiously gazed to see that all was safe and well; and the father being the soonest satisfied, he stepped close up to Balmat, and exclaimed, in an angry tone:

"What does all this mean, neighbour Gabriel? What have you been doing to my children?"

On hearing this, Adrienne turned again quickly; and, taking hold of her father's hand, she said, with much earnestness:

"Oh, nothing—nothing—father, but what was very good and very kind to us! Little Josephine fell into the river, and M. Balmat ran in to save her from being drowned."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Carrier; "then I am more obliged to him than I should have been to any man in the district! One expects a good turn from a friend, and no thanks; but when an enemy does it, he deserves our gratitude. Come, Gabriel, give me your hand, and let us be good neighbours henceforward."

"Not so fast, Jean Carrier!" replied Balmat, in a tone more serious than sullen, and folding his arms across his breast; "I cannot give my hand to a man who has not some share of my heart. I am an open enemy, at any rate. But I have no objection to be friends with little Adrienne there! Will you let her embrace me?"

"To be sure I will, if she likes it. It would be hard to refuse that to him who saved her sister's life."

"Tut, tut, man! I didn't save the child's life, and had no notion of doing it—and Adrienne knows that. But she is a brave and a good-hearted girl; and there's something about her that has struck a new light into my mind altogether; and so will you give me a kiss, Adrienne?"

Half reluctant, half willing, and blushing deeply, the little girl received the proffered embrace.

"Thank you—thank you! and heaven bless you! You are a good child!" said Balmat, abruptly; and he turned away and walked rapidly down the river-side, till he came to the rustic bridge of planks just opposite the source of the Aveyron, at the foot of the Glacier des Bois, and which led close up to his own house.

The Carriers looked after him for some time, and then turned towards their home again, being anxious to get the children quickly relieved from their wet garments. While they walked along, the mother questioned Adrienne as to the recent adventure, Jean being deep in reflection on the strange character of his neighbour; and one of the men, turning to his companion, remarked, that it was the first time that Cruel Gabriel was known to do a good action, embrace a fellow-creature, or say "Heaven bless you!"

CHAPTER II.

The effect produced by this occurrence on the wayward mind of Balmat was powerful. It was like that caused by some heavy substance flung into a dark and stagnant lake. It seemed to heave it up in wild convulsion from its very depths, without purifying its nature, or changing its hue. The colour of Balmat's character was the same as ever; but one beam shone upon and trembled in it, like the reflection of a single star in the water's gloom. Unloving and unloved, he felt suddenly as though it were possible for him to feel and to inspire regard. The courage shown by Adrienne in braving his rage, her goodness in interposing between him and her father, the fine expression of her countenance as she received his embrace, were all stirring in his memory during the whole of that day; and without his knowing it, they had sunk deep and softly into his heart.

The first actual proof which spoke to him in conviction of this effect, was a wish that he had happened to marry young, like Jean Carrier; and that, like him, he had had such a daughter as little Adrienne. Balmat was then about thirty years of age—Carrier only a few years older: so that the wish, which thus took the form of a regret, was only extravagant, as being unattainable.

His next notion was, that he would immediately marry, on the chance of having a child that he could love, and who might love him. But the impossibility of this, without also having a wife, and the repugnance with which he had ever considered such an incumbrance on his freedom, soon removed that thought. A hundred other cogitations—one wilder and more complicated than another—occupied him for hours on this eventful day; and as it closed in, he was himself convinced that he had never passed one so free from evil thoughts or unkindly feelings. His workmen and his old woman-servant could not imagine what had come over him. He neither cursed, nor swore, nor frowned, nor looked vicious, from morning till night; and on retiring to bed, he actually muttered: "Bon soir, Jeannette!" He even dreamed pleasantly—he confessed it to the old woman, as she gave him his coffee the next morning: and that was even a greater proof than the tenor of his waking thoughts, that his mind was imbued with a happy influence, which shone through its most shadowy mysteries.

But, as he awoke to a full sense of all that had been passing in his brain, another change came rapidly through it, forcing him back to almost his original state of feeling. Pride flashed fiercely upon his relaxing violence of character, and he felt as though degraded by the incipient tenderness which had been stealing on him. The re-action was desperate. His ferocity wholly returned against all mankind, with one exception. Little Adrienne came in for no share of it. Had his resentment fixed upon her, as the object which had caused the weakness he now revolted from—had she attracted the heat of his angry self-contempt—he had been completely lost. But happily her gentle influence remained unbroken, to humanise him, and give him at least a chance among his fellow-men.

Some weeks passed by without any outward change being evident in Gabriel Balmat. An overture towards a better acquaintanceship had been made to him on the part of Jean Carrier by one of the farmers, with whom they both had dealings. It was peremptorily rejected; and as a report of his having saved a child from drowning spread in the neighbourhood, Balmat seemed resolved to give it the lie by every practical contradiction. He showed all his usual symptoms of cruelty to animals, and moroseness to human beings. Private quarrels, prosecutions before the village magistrate, and threatened law-suits, were the consequences; but these had no terrors for Gabriel, to whom they were the familiar circumstances of his uneasy life.

Yet still, mixed with all this odious perversity, and now, perhaps, by some possible caprice of nature exciting to it, was the extraordinary sentiment of affection—or something like it—towards Adrienne Carrier. There was no positive evidence of this beyond Gabriel's own consciousness—for he made no attempt to see the child; but negative presumption was afforded in his abstinence from all acts of arrogance towards the father of the little peace-maker, whose mill-stream was now unobstructed, the banks unbroken, and the wheel left free from those nightly assaults which had, on many occasions, disturbed its machinery, and caused cost and loss of time, besides manifold feelings of vexation, to the honest owner.

Balmat several times took a solitary stroll up the river's side—early in the morning, at noon, or in the evening; but if he sought for Adrienne, or hoped to meet her again, he was disappointed—for her mother, blessing the Virgin for her children's late providential escape, strictly watched their movements now, that they might not again encounter such a risk. But, from another point of view—often reached in the course of his wanderings—he frequently saw the happy little girl. It was one of the elevations near the Glacier des Bois, and from which travellers sometimes are indulged with an imperfect view of the mer de glace, that Balmat used, unobserved himself, to gaze down upon Adrienne, sporting about with her young brothers and sister, and the goats, which it was part of her duty to attend in their pasturage, close to the precincts of her father's mill. And it was in the solitude of this isolated spot that Gabriel resolved on the execution of a plan—which was, to combine with his own gratification the sure infliction of such misery on Jean Carrier, his hatred for whom seemed to increase in proportion with the intense but unaccountable fancy he had taken for his child.

It would seem that, before putting the plan alluded to into execution, he considered it necessary to have at least the sanction of a recognition, a look of regard, a negative acceptance of his proffered friendship, from the innocent object so unconsciously implicated in his project. It was therefore that, one Sunday morning—that which was fixed on for Adrienne going through the ceremony of her "first communion"—five or six weeks after the river adventure, Balmat was seen—a most unwonted circumstance—lounging in the close neighbourhood of the village church, as the congregation were pouring out after the conclusion of the service. The rigid figure and sullen look of "the wicked miller" formed no pleasant object for the rustics, who, after piously praying, were now going forth to their day's enjoyment, with light hearts and quiet consciences. Several of the females muttered an incantation, or cautiously made the sign of the cross on their breast, as a preservative against evil. But when the Carrier family appeared, more indications were shown of their abhorrence and alarm. One of the little boys, who first perceived Gabriel, ran screaming back to his mother, who, catching a sight of this cause of terror, immediately clasped the child closely with one arm, at the same time snatching little Adrienne towards her, and calling for protection to her husband, who followed her. The latter, also perceiving Balmat, at the same instant stepped forward between him and the beloved group, and stood without speaking, but with a look expressive of his determination to defend them against any attempt at ill-treatment.

Balmat regarded all these symptoms with a smile of deadly contempt—but it vanished in a moment from his countenance, to give way to an earnest and insinuating look fixed on Adrienne, who, contrary to the absurd custom general in continental countries, of disfiguring children with an unseemly display of tawdry finery, was dressed with modest simplicity. Balmat's look, fixed on the handsome and interesting child, spoke, almost as plain as words could have done:

"Do you remember me? You do not hate me, in spite of all this hostility?"

Adrienne certainly caught the spirit of the look, if not quite the letter of its meaning; and she answered by a smile full of sweetness, sensibility, and good feeling.

"Enough!" said Balmat, aloud; "now good morning to you, neighbour Jean! You and your wife may keep your angry looks until there is occasion for them!"

With these words he turned away, and poor Carrier and his wife, alarmed more at the tone and look of the speaker than at the words themselves, walked silently home to the mill, keeping the children within arm's length all the way, and throwing many a wistful glance around, apprehensive of some hidden treachery at every turn of the road. And deeply did they bewail, during that Sunday evening, the chance which had given them for a neighbour so ill-disposed a man as Balmat: one who had not even a cause for his vindictiveness and spite—who returned evil for good, and seemed to hang like some black cloud, darkening their path of life.

A month more passed by. This untoward rencontre was almost forgotten. The continued absence of local annoyance gave hopes to the Carriers that Balmat's hostile feelings were, after all, subsiding; and honest Jean, and even his less confiding wife, relaxed their strict measures of precaution, and began to think that they had judged too hastily, and probably looked too harshly on the memorable day, which now began to be distinguished in the recollection and conversation of the villagers, as "Gabriel's Sunday"—from the uncommon circumstance of his having been then seen at the church door.

CHAPTER III.

It was now summer. The snows had melted from the mountain pastures, and the flocks and herds resumed their wonted station, driven carefully up the hilly paths at dawn, and down again at sunset, to the cadenced monotony of the Ranz des Vaches, or the other common gathering calls of a deep-sounding horn. Gabriel Balmat being a mountaineer as well as a miller, followed, in the summer season especially, the idle and rambling pursuits that he was born to, in a more absolute degree than the steady and regular habits of the calling to which he was brought up. He often took his rifle and joined the chamois hunters of the Breton or the Buet—or straggled alone to the glaciers—or wandered off to the mines of Touilly, and wasted precious hours in looking listlessly at the operations of the workmen. His long absences from home were therefore nothing remarkable; and nobody wondered—just at the open now in question—that the business of the mill was almost completely neglected by its wayward master; nor did any one trouble himself with conjectures as to the particular motives which led him thus away. But a faint light soon broke on the darkness of his recent doings.

One morning, soon after sunrise, Balmat returned to his solitary and unsocial home, and found the old woman fatigued with her night's watching, and wondering at the unusual circumstance of his having slept abroad.

"Slept!" echoed Gabriel, in a tone of savage jocularity. "Did the sun sleep, old Jeannette, before it rose up into heaven erewhile, and lit the mountain-tops? So much did I, and no more. Sleep! no—no! I am not the man to sleep when an enemy is to be injured, or a service rendered to myself, old girl!"

"Holy Mary! you have not done any harm to Jean Carrier?" asked Jeannette, in alarm.

"Make your mind easy, my good old friend; I have not seen him."

"Nor done him a mischief in the dark?"

"Humph! you question me too closely, Jeannette; but nothing can make me angry to-day—so give me a cup of coffee—I must prepare for business."

"For bed, you mean, my master: you want repose, even more than I do, it seems."

"Repose! not I, Jeannette; I am as light and refreshed as though I had slept since sunset. More so than neighbour Jean will be, perhaps, when he rises by-and-by."

"Well, that is strange!" exclaimed the old woman, looking out of the open window. "The old saying holds good—no sooner do we talk of old Master Carrier than he appears."

"The deuce he does!" cried Balmat; "is he here so soon? Let me to bed now in earnest! Prudence, prudence, Jeannette, as you value your own place, and dread my anger!"

So saying, he hurried into an inner room, threw off his clothes, and flung himself on the bed. In a moment more Jean Carrier had reached the house, walked round to the front door, and struck loudly at it for admission. The old woman hobbled towards it, and slowly let him in.

"Where is your master?" asked Carrier, with a voice almost choked from agitation.

"Good morning, Master Carrier! It is indeed as strange to see you in Gabriel Balmat's mill, as it would be if the Buet had paid a visit to the Breven! Ha! ha! ha!"

"Crone! torture me not with your nonsense—where is Gabriel Balmat? I must speak to him!"

"Lord love you, neighbour, he doesn't talk in his sleep! He is in his bed, to be sure! What's the matter?"

"The matter, old woman? You know that, methinks!" answered Carrier, with a scrutinising glance.

"In good troth, I do not—and I hope from my heart that no evil has happened to you, Master Carrier."

"It is very odd, if you speak truly—and yet there is a tone of truth about you. Tell me, then, Jeannette—and as you hope for mercy, tell me truly—where is what I seek for this cruel morning?"

"As I hope for heaven, I know not what you mean, nor what brings you here!" replied the old woman.

"Ah, Jeannette, have you then known me so long, and to so little purpose? and does your experience of life not tell you that nothing could bring an injured man into his enemy's den, short of a search after his dearest treasure? Jeannette, I have lost my child!"

"Gracious powers!"

"My eldest girl—my Adrienne—she whom her mother and myself love better than all the rest! God forgive us, if it be a sin! Perhaps this is for punishment. You know nothing of her—she is not here?" uttered the father, in rapid agitation.

"No, so help me heaven!"

"Then I must instantly have speech with Gabriel. Let him arise immediately—tell him I am here."

"Assuredly, good Master Carrier, that would not be the most likely way to make him rise quickly; for you can have no welcome to expect from him."

"Woman, it is my child I expect from him. Ay, and that I will have, or his life's blood!"

"Hush—hush, Jean Carrier! You are rash in this violent talk. If he hears it, this will end badly for one or both of ye. What can he know of your little girl? I tell you she isn't here!"

"And I tell you that no one knows of her but him, and I will tell him so, too; and I will not be baffled by your cunning, nor browbeat by his brutality. I am sure that Adrienne is concealed here. Adrienne! Adrienne! speak out, my child! Don't be afraid to answer me! It is your father that calls you! Adrienne! Adrienne! Adrienne!"

As Carrier cried forth in this wild manner for his lost daughter, he stalked up and down the little hall, striking his stick against the doors and presses. The old woman clasped her hands, gazed at the half-distracted father, and burst into tears of honest sympathy.

"Hollos! what does all this mean?" roared Balmat, from an inner room; and, at the noise of his leaping out of bed, Jeannette screamed nervously, fearing the consequence of some terrible collision between the men. The parlour door was dashed open, and Balmat plunged into the passage, undressed, his blue cotton night-cap on his head, and a drawn cutlass—his constant weapon—in his raised hand. As he appeared, he exclaimed:

"What—robbers in the house! Ha! is it you neighbour Carrier? How's this? Is Mont Blanc turned upside down? Is this really you—and to what do I owe the honour of this early and unlooked-for visit?"

"Gabriel Balmat!" said Carrier, stopping, leaning on his walking-stick, and looking sternly in the face of him he addressed, "those sarcastic words, and that sneering smile, come from a bad heart! You know well what brings me here! It needs no miracle to make a half-maddened father seek his child in the place where he is convinced she is hidden. Give her back to me instantly!"

"Pray, Master Carrier, do me the favour to sit down," said Balmat, coolly, and at the same time offering a chair to his angry visitor, who had followed him into the parlour; "I will be ready to receive you in a fitting dress presently; but really you broke my dreams so suddenly, that I know not what to think of all this. I don't quite understand you!"

As Balmat retreated into the inner room, Carrier mechanically sat down, overcome with astonishment, and shocked by his air of sullen indifference, which the unhappy parent could not suppose coupled with the monstrous guilt of which he suspected and accused him.

"Oh, God! where is she, then?" exclaimed Carrier, starting up again. "What has become of her?" and he was on the point of rushing out of the house, when the well-intentioned but timorous old woman interposed between him and the doorway, saying, significantly:

"Don't be so hasty, good Master Jean! don't throw away a chance of finding what you seek!"

"She is here, then, after all? Gabriel has hidden her?" sternly whispered the father.

"No, she is not here; nor do I say he has hidden her," replied Jeannette, in a muttering, under-voice; "but," added she, aloud, "the counsel of a neighbour is worth having in such a case, and it is better to take my master's advice than to provoke his resentment. You have accused him rashly—he is not a man to bear a wrong tamely."

"Well, well, I'll wait till he is ready," said Carrier, a gleam of hope flashing across his mind, which grew dark or bright in equally rapid shifts. He returned into the parlour, and was immediately joined by Balmat, wrapped up in his coarse morning costume.

"Now, neighbour Jean," said the latter, both seating themselves, "let me hear what you have to say to me, and remember that a drowsy man, roused suddenly out of his sleep, is rarely in a temper to bear hard words—particularly from an enemy! What has happened?"

"Gabriel," replied Carrier, "we have no need to be enemies. Our fathers were friends before we were born; and God knows I have done nothing to provoke your hatred! Have I?"

"Never mind—that has nothing to do with what you are now come about."

"I think it has a great deal, Gabriel; and if you would but answer me according to your conscience, my visit would not be for nothing. But I will forgive you everything, freely, amply—all the evil you have done me for years past—if you will now give me —"

"What?" asked Balmat, fiercely.

"Your advice as to the best means of recovering my poor child!" sobbed the unhappy father, held in check by the warning of the old woman, and by Balmat's ferocious tone and look.

"Why, what do you take me for, neighbour Carrier? A conjuror is it, or a gipsy fortune-teller? What should I know of your children, any more than I do of yourself? Which of them have you lost?"

"Which! she that is worth all the rest—my own darling pet, and her mother's, too—little Adrienne!"

"Adrienne—which is that?"

"Not the one you saved from drowning, Gabriel, but the eldest; she whom you kissed, and who spoke so well of you; she with the black eyes and long, plaited hair. Oh, Balmat, if you have the feelings of a man, think what I suffer! and, for the love of heaven, and in mercy to my poor heart, tell me—what would you recommend me to do?"

"What put it into your head that she was here?"

"What! why, because—really I cannot well answer that question; but I suppose it was because I thought you had taken a fancy to her—and —"

"Did you suppose I kidnapped her?"

"Oh, no, no—not at all; but I thought she might have strayed here from the mill, and that you kept her out of a frolic—that's all—that's all!" said Carrier, with a forced smile, and scarcely able to restrain his tears.

"I am such a frolicsome fellow! eh, Jean?—Now, did you ever know me to play a funny trick in your life?" asked Balmat, with a diabolical grin.

"Why, I cannot say I ever did before. But this time you have done so—confess that you have! Oh, Gabriel, put me out of pain! Do, like an honest, good-hearted fellow, as I am sure you are, after all! Come, come—she is here—you have her safe for me! Call her forth, Gabriel—do—do!"

But Balmat never wincing under the touch of poor Carrier's palm, which lay on his shoulder, entreatingly; nor did he shrink from the brimful look of supplication sent from the eyes of the agitated father. On the contrary, he stared him full in the face, and coolly asked him:

"What does your wife say to all this?"

"Oh, thank God, she knows nothing of it—she would be distracted, if she did! But she was asleep when I left the mill—for she has been up nearly all night, nursing the youngest boy, who is sore ailing. No, no—my good Christine knows nothing of it!"

"Perhaps she will be able to put you on the right scent—for you are grievously out of it here, friend Jean!"

"You don't really say so, Balmat—you don't in earnest deny that Adrienne is here! I shall go stark mad under this suspense!"

"Bah! bah! That would do you no good whatever! Go home quietly to your work, neighbour, and laugh over this little affair with your wife! The stray lamb will no doubt come back of itself!"

Poor Carrier did not know what to think of this bantering tone, accompanied by a fiendish sneer which made him shudder. What could he do or say? It was useless to break out into reproach or menace—he had probably gone too far already in that way. He had no proof. Balmat was not a man to be bullied into anything, right or wrong. Nor was it possible to affect his feelings on the score of compassion. What was the poor father to do? How could he face towards home, and tell the sad tidings to his wife?

Such were the thoughts that passed through Jean Carrier's mind, as he rocked himself to and fro on his chair, moaning heavily the while; and as Balmat sat, with his arms folded, calmly studying and deeply enjoying this picture of intense distress, they were interrupted by old Jeannette who exclaimed, as she entered the room

"Well, well, here's a pretty business! As I live, if Christine Carrier and two of her children are not coming straight into the house!"

"Two! oh, which—which? Is Adrienne one of them?" cried Carrier, starting up and rushing forth.

"Very well, Jeannette," said Balmat; "so much the better! Let Madame Carrier come in, and as many of the family as she chooses to bring to my hospitable door! Ha! ha! ha! I shall be glad to see how she bears this business!"

The old woman gazed in wonder, turned aside, and blessed herself. She never before had known Gabriel Balmat to laugh aloud.

Jean met his wife at the threshold of the house. She rushed, sobbing, into his arms; while he, on seeing that she whom he sought was not in the group, turned deadly pale and faint.

"God help us!" said he; "I thought she had been found!"

"Oh, Jean—oh, my husband! where is our dear child? When they told me just now that she had disappeared in the night, and that you had gone forth to seek her, I made sure I should find you here, and her with you; but that pale face, those haggard looks, tell me that you have not found her! She is not, then, with Gabriel Balmat?"

"He says not—he will not give me any real answer! Heaven knows what I ought to think or believe!"

"Oh, let me speak to him! He will not be deaf to the prayer of a mother, with her weeping children!" exclaimed the wife, quickly seizing the half-frightened boy and girl, one in each hand, and passing into the house. She went on through the open door, into the parlour, where Balmat still sat, with a dogged and imperturbable air, the old woman bustling about, to restrain the emotion she could not quite repress, and was afraid to betray.

"Oh, Monsieur Balmat! will you not tell me the truth about my dear Adrienne?" was her first question.

"To be sure I will, Madame Carrier!" was the reply.

"I told you he would—I knew it!" exclaimed the delighted woman to her husband, who was now by her side.

"Well, M. Balmat?"

"Well! she is lost, and it seems you have small chance of finding her—that is the real truth."

"Good God, what a mockery! How can you smile so at our wretchedness? How can you sport so unfeelingly with us? Have you a notion of what we suffer?"

"How should I—I am not a parent?"

"But you are a human being—you cannot be quite dead to all feelings for others?"

"Very true—and to prove it, let me tell you you are now really losing a great deal of precious time. Have you looked well into the mill-stream and the river?" said Balmat, as if to work upon the unhappy parents to the greatest excess of fear. With the mother he succeeded; but on the father his words and look had the contrary effect.

"You may be satisfied, Christine, that all is right," said Carrier to his wife; "nothing short of a demon could have uttered that sentence, if he was not sure of the child's safety!"

"And how do you know that I am not a demon?" said Balmat, in his most savage manner, furious at having failed to agonise his victim more completely. "How do you dare attribute any feelings to me but what I choose to express? or deceive yourself with hopes about my knowing anything about your girl? You may be sure of one thing—that if I did know anything about her, I would not tell it to you—so you may now leave me to my business, and go about yours!"

So saying, he rose from his chair, and attempted to leave the room; but Madame Carrier threw herself between him and the door, and, dropping on her knees caught him by the coat-skirts so fast, that he could not disengage himself. The two children, full of terror at the scene, clung to their mother and wept aloud, while she broke out into a burst of supplication, the eloquence of which was in her looks and gestures.

"Gabriel! Gabriel! as you have a soul to be saved, tell me the truth—do not sport with me thus—look at these little ones—on this one whose life you saved—on me, a distracted mother—oh, take pity on me! Think of your own mother, Gabriel—think what she would have suffered in my place, had she lost you, as I have lost my child! Oh, what have you done to her? Have you murdered her?"

"Mur-der-ed her!" repeated Balmat, slowly drawing out the terrible word—while his scowling look, and the livid hue which suddenly overspread his visage, made his aspect altogether frightful. The children hid their faces in their mother's dress. Carrier turned his aside. Even the accustomed old woman shrank away. But the mother quailed not.

"Ay, murdered her! on my oath and on my conscience I believe you have! I read the truth in your guilty looks!"

These words, uttered with the fierce emphasis of conviction, were followed by a hoarse scream, as the mother started to her feet, and pushed Balmat from beside her.

"Yes, yes!" she continued in frantic accents, "on have murdered my child! Villain, I see the truth! Murder! Murder! Justice on the murderer! Husband, hasten to the magistrate—denounce the monster—bring the gen-darmes to seize him—he shall not escape—I will cling to him and hold him fast! Oh, my child—my child! my poor Adrienne! Fly, Jean—fly! It is too late to save our daughter, but not too late for revenge!"

As she spoke, she attempted to seize Balmat, who calmly kept her off, and only answered this rhapsody by a look of diabolical contempt. The husband endeavoured to calm her. Old Jeannette interfered for the same purpose. The result of her overstrained agitation was a flood of tears and violent hysterics. While Carrier trained her fondly in his arms, old Jeannette, more accustomed and with more presence of mind, loosened her dress, placed her stays, and called out to Balmat:

"Water—water! oh, my good master, you won't refuse a small service to the unfortunate woman?"

"Refuse it! no, Jeannette; she may have the whole ill-stream, if you will but fling her into it!"

So saying, he left the room, and the house immediately afterwards, and was seen no more at the mill till nightfall. Jean Carrier did not observe him going out, so occupied was he with his suffering wife; and, on her recovering from the fit, he led her and his children to their now intrusted home, thence to proceed on other inquiries, which he felt, by anticipation, to be as vain as those we have just recorded.

CHAPTER V.

We must now go back for a month or more, and account for what may appear doubtful in the circumstances of this case.

The very day after the Sunday on which Adrienne made her première communion, Balmat began a series of operations, all intended to lead to the result which produced the painful scenes just recorded. He took his way to the mountains, and wandered far up into the recesses of that mighty series of ravine and rock which lies beyond the Montvert, and between the mer de glace and the stupendous basis of granite pyramid, called the Aiguille de Chamois. Accustomed from early life to those intricate paths, he went quickly on, and soon surmounted the first light obstacles which seem so formidable to lowland travellers. In a little more, he was in a region of romantic savagery, of which description can give but a faint notion, and to the glorious enjoyment of which few have the curiosity or energy to penetrate. After a two hours' walk, he arrived at the spot previously fixed on for the scene of the labours which he now commenced in earnest.

It was in a small, deep glen, ramparted with huge piles of granite, so sequestered and so nearly inaccessible, that no coward ever led his troop to feed in its rich pasturage; and it was rare indeed that ever an adventurous botanist rifled it of the Alpine plants which profusely covered its sides. The ruins of a small chalet, which had, with its inmates, been destroyed by an avalanche several years before, was the only mark of man in this wild spot. That catastrophe, and the superstitious belief attached to it, kept the native mountaineers away; and even the guides, who led strangers to view more beaten, but less beautiful scenes, carefully avoided a descent into "the haunted gorge"—the name by which this oasis was known.

Gabriel Balmat, with the prompt vigour which characterises men like him when they have one important object in view, fell to work, on his first visit, to clear away the interior obstructions which made the ruined chalet quite uninhabitable. After a whole day's labour, he found he had done almost nothing; and he was moreover convinced that small progress could be made, until he was provided with sufficient instruments to effect his purpose. A pickaxe, hatchet, spade, and shovel, were absolutely necessary; and these he procured in the valley, and conveyed at intervals to the scene of his secret doings.

By constant application he in a few days succeeded in making the dilapidated hut assume a habitable look; and he brought up, from time to time, unobserved and unsuspected, various articles of domestic use, and a few even of ornament, somewhat incongruous with the aspect of the place. A table and a bench, just large enough for two persons, were roughly hewn out of some recovered planks; a couch of dimensions suited to one—and that one but of small growth—was constructed of the same materials, and covered with moss and leaves, over which was spread a coverlet, white as the snowy mantle of the eternal peaks that threw their long shadows down the glen. A few books, meant for the capacity of a child, and some well-daubed prints, just fit for rustic taste, lay on the table, or were nailed against the walls. Branches of pine-wood, ready for firing, were placed in the chimney of the one room thus made habitable. A few cooking utensils and eating necessities were ranged on a couple of shelves. The roof was repaired with care and skill; and, from the light sods which covered the branches forming each patch, tufts of many-coloured flowers sent forth odours which the scented saloons of a palace could not rival.

To complete the internal comforts of the place, a soft, thick carpet, of the same materials as the couch, concealed the inequalities and hardness of the floor; and a web of printed cotton was fastened in gay festoons across the window space: which, be it mentioned, was without glass or frame, but defended by cross-bars of vine-branches, so closely and so firmly nailed together, that the light was admitted through spaces scarcely wide enough to allow the passage of a clenched hand; and it must have been the arm of a Hercules that could have wrenched those defences away. Two old boxes, dug out of the ruins, cleaned, lined, and differently filled, lay ready for the use of the intended occupant. The door was renewed, placed on its hinges once more, and provided with a solid lock. And thus did Gabriel Balmat finish the construction of this mountain prison, this romantic cage, to which he meant to commit, in pursuance of his strange experiment, a being of as innocent, as virtuous, and as original a mind as ever dwelt in the wild freedom of the Alps.

Having actually completed his laborious task of preparation, he looked around the little chamber thus snatched into a new existence, as he sat one evening on the moss-covered bench, shone upon by the beams of the setting sun, which streamed gloriously between the wooden bars of the window.

"Well, the work is done!" soliloquised Balmat; "and a hard job it was! How odd it is that I should have made so light of all this labour, for the sake of a simple child, that I would not have undertaken for all the finest women of the world—nor for the proudest men, either. Men and women! No, by the glorious sun, and the bright heavens he shines in, I would not do a day's work to save the created world, except little Adrienne—for I am resolved to make her an exception—and something tells me that she will love me, after all! I wonder if she will like all this; if she will take a fancy to this home—this house of houses; if she will be satisfied with what I have done for her; if she will love me!"

"Well, this is a curious world we live in, and men and women are curious things, that's certain! Here I am now, alone, like the first man, looking out, as it were, for the creation of a being who can be a second self to me; who can at least sympathise with and let me love her. This little girl is the only person that I ever took the least fancy to; I have felt a repugnance to every other being I ever knew; ay, even old Jeannette is disagreeable to me, if I don't actually hate her; and I suppose I should hate her, like the rest, if I didn't find her absolutely necessary to me.

"Well, it is not my fault that nature formed my mind after this fashion. I suppose I would have been like my fellow-creatures, if I could. But, after all, I doubt if I differ much from the others. I firmly believe they detest each other quite as much as I abhor them; only just that they have more cunning in hiding their feelings, and I more courage in acting on mine. Are they not all filled with hatred, and malice, and uncharitableness? Out on them! Mankind is, after all, an odious combination. It is a great point gained for me to have fallen accidentally on one living thing that I can love without envying, and wish well to, without selfishness. Such, I verily believe, is little Adrienne to me—but what shall I be to her? We shall see—we shall see—and quickly!"

There are probably few people who have not at times had flitting notions like those shooting across their brain. But whether it is the "cunning" that Gabriel thought of, or a higher feeling of conscientious indulgence for that unworthiness of which every one feels himself a part, it is fortunate for the world that individuals who despise their fellows quite as much as he did his, most frequently make a tacit compromise with them, in consideration of their own imperfections.

Gabriel had never in his life felt so proud and buoyant as during the three weeks of laborious secrecy just described; and, when all was over, he proceeded with a bold, light step down towards Chamouni. After the soliloquy above recorded, he enjoyed all the excitement of one who feels that he has laid a foundation on which to build a fabric of fortune, fame, or happiness. Yet he had, as has been seen, some misgivings as to what Adrienne might feel towards him and his doings; but he never had a qualm as to the suffering he was about to inflict on her parents. He had, therefore, just enough of uncertainty to give a zest to his hopes, and none of the anticipated remorse which might have turned them into pain.

It must be here remarked, that Balmat had followed up the momentary church-door glance of acquaintanceship, by two or three stolen peeps at Adrienne, observed only by her, while she sported about her father's mill of an evening, with the little herd of goats and the children under her care. On one of these occasions he even spoke to her from behind a rock, to which he had crept, quite unperceived by her play-fellows. A very few words passed between him and her on this occasion. But a great advance was made in their intercourse by two or three sentences. He asked her if she would walk with him one evening up the mountain. She cheerfully assented.

"And you will not be afraid to trust yourself with me?" said Balmat.

"I am not afraid of anything," said Adrienne. And such was the positive truth. She was a child of intrepid spirit. There was a dash of adventurous courage in her character that would have been almost unfeminine, had it not been tempered by a generous and gentle spirit, essentially and wholly womanly.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

METALLIC COMPOSITION FOR MOULDING, &c.—M. Chameroy, of Paris, has taken out a patent for melting one part of some easily fusible metal in a crucible, and then mixing with it four parts of a metal far less readily fusible, steeped in ammonia and reduced to powder. Such a compound is stated to be of great solidity, hardness, facility of soldering, melts at a low temperature, and has great tractability in moulding to any form, and in casting takes the sharpest impressions, while in its nature it is peculiarly unchangeable.

SUPPLY OF COAL TO THE METROPOLIS.—The following abstract of authentic documents shows the quantity of coal and coke brought by railway within the London district, and entered at the London coal-market during the half year ending the 30th of June, 1853: By the Great Northern Railway, 181,152 tons, 3 cwt.; North Western, 73,005 tons, 9 cwt.; Eastern Counties, 30,264 tons, 6 cwt.; South Eastern, 5923 tons, 8 cwt.; Great Western, 6016 tons, 10 cwt.—making a total of 296,361 tons, 16 cwt.: being an increase over the corresponding period of last year of 9315 tons. Deducting the decrease by canal from the increase by rail, the total additional quantity of coal brought into London during the past half year, compared with the corresponding period last year, is 106,975 tons—or an increase of about 34 per cent.

TREATING BITUMINOUS SUBSTANCES.—A patent has been secured by Mr. Wm. Brown, of Glasgow, for an improved method of treating coal and other bituminous substances and their volatile products. The coal, or other bitumen, is first distilled in conjunction with steam; the volatile products are similarly re-distilled, when a variety of oils are produced, some containing paraffine, pure and impure, naphtha, &c.—which, on further refinement, are rendered fit for commercial purposes.

MINES IN EGYPT.—Mr. Bryant, in the Evening Post (U.S.), says: "When I was in Upper Egypt, I fell in with an Indian who was employed to obtain sulphur from a mine among these mountains. They are incredibly rich (said he) in beds of ore of various metals and other mineral productions; but these cannot be worked for want of fuel. Egypt has no mines of coal; all that is used in her steamers and manufactures is brought from England. She has springs of mineral oil, the indication of beds of coal, and wherever they are to be found the government has made excavations to a great depth and at great cost, but without success. An Arab, in wandering among the mountains near the Red Sea, not long since, found a little pool of quicksilver, where it had flowed from the rocks. He attempted to scoop it up with his hands, but it slid through his fingers; he then drew it up into his mouth, filled with it the leather bottle in which he carried water, and brought it home. He was taken ill immediately afterwards, and died, probably from the effects of the quicksilver he had swallowed—so that the spot where he found it is still unknown, though diligent search has been made for it."

DECIMAL COINAGE.—The committee on decimal coinage have concluded the examination of witnesses, and the result, it is understood, will be a unanimous report in favour of the adoption of the system, making the pound sterling the integer, and dividing it into 1000 units or farthings. Dr. Bowring's Chinese experiences of the facility of the system are said to have been most satisfactory, and he produced an instrument (abacus) by which arithmetic is taught in the schools of China; and stated that a Chinese youth, after a month's instruction, is far more competent to apply all the rules of arithmetic to the business of life, than a learner on our plans of instruction would be after the teaching of years. Its use in our elementary schools was suggested to the committee.

PREVENTION OF THE POTATO DISEASE.—The Journal d'Agriculture Pratique mentions a mode of preventing the malady in potatoes, and which, it says, comes from Russia. It simply consists in drying the potatoes completely, and then planting them in the usual way. The discovery, it says, was the effect of chance. A farmer, in 1850, had placed a quantity of potatoes in an exceedingly warm room, and in three weeks they became completely dried up. He then set them in the usual manner, and was quite astonished at obtaining, not only a more abundant crop, but one completely sound. He repeated the experiment in 1851, and had the same result, the yield being nine for one.

BISCUIT OVENS.—Carlisle, the great seat of the biscuit manufacture, has here furnished us with a most important improvement in the apparatus for baking. This contrivance, which is now in full operation at the extensive biscuit works of Mr. Slater, has been devised for baking all articles of this class, as well as bread, and even earthenware, by traversing them through a heated earthenware tube. This tube forms the oven; it is of considerable length; and the biscuits or other articles are slowly traversed through it, from end to end, at such a rate as will allow of the baking being completed during the passage. The biscuits are carried on trays, set on travelling chains; or the trays may be made into an endless web or chain. The oven is thus entirely self-acting, and the baking articles demand no attention whatever from the attendants, whilst the system involves superior economy and better baking. A pyrometer, or heat indicator, is also attached externally—so that the attendant can regulate the heat with very great facility. The object of such improvements is to reduce the cost of baking, and to improve the appearance of the baked articles; and the apparatus is applicable as well to the baking of clay or earthenware articles, as to bread or biscuits.

HORTON AND WYLDE'S PATENT STEAM-GENERATORS.

—The steam-generators are modifications, in some few particulars, of the arrangement described in the enrolled specification of Messrs. Horton and Wyld's patent of April, 1852; the difference being merely in matter of detail, not at all affecting the general plan: the second of these is considered to be the more economical, and is undoubtedly more simple in its construction than the first. In both these arrangements the prominent and novel feature is the application of steam generated in an inner vessel, to vaporise water in an outer one; heating surfaces, consisting partly of tubes, being in each vessel the mode in which the heat is applied. From this arrangement a great advantage is derived as regards the safety of the boiler, and a very much smaller degree of attention is called for on the part of the engineer: as a constant succession of vaporisation, condensation, and re-vaporisation is going on between the fluid contents of the two vessels. Boilers of this construction occupy little space; the more than ordinary heating surface, and the great strength being obtained by the tubes, and the manner of fixing them. Although the receptacle for the sedimentary deposits is here immediately over the fire-grate, the usual objection is now done away with: as the same water being returned over and over again without the introduction of feed, the sediment is in a short time removed by the mud-cocks, the water becomes perfectly pure and smooth, and clear surfaces are maintained in the boiler, insuring the absorption of the full effect of the fire, without incrustation and consequent damage to the plates.

THE BOSPHORUS.

In the present condition of politics in the East, and in the presence of the strong probability that the dismemberment of the Turkish empire cannot be much longer postponed, we have thought it due to our readers to make them familiarly acquainted with some of the most prominent features of Constantinople and its vicinity—in short, with some welcome artistic assistance, to afford them a lively idea of the country and the people.

The Turks, once the most formidable warriors in the world, first claim our attention; and the question is naturally asked—Who are the Turks, that they should have made, and are making, such a noise in the world? We regret that we cannot convey any very precise information as to their origin. They are supposed to have been a branch of the great Sarmatian family, known to the ancients under the appellation of the Scythians beyond the Imaus.

Their original country appears to have been the Altaian Mountains, whence they spread as far as the Lake Mæotis and the banks of the Oxus. It was towards the middle of the sixth century, according to the indefatigable and eloquent Gibbon, that Europe felt the shock of that revolution which first revealed to the world the name and nation of the Turks. But the fact is, that their name, like that of the Huns, is too vague and general to determine the identity of the people to whom it is applied. The word "Turk" is said to signify Wanderer—its signification is extremely vagabondish—but by the Ottomans it is spurned with disdain. It is clear, however, that the term was used ages ago to designate the various hordes inhabiting Eastern and Western Tartary: and from this it has, with some show of reason, been inferred, that the Mongols and Tartars ought to be classed as two branches of the great Turkish family. This theory receives some countenance from the circumstance that in the hostile correspondence between Tamerlane and Bajazet, the Mongol emperor distinguishes himself and race by the name of Turk, and stigmatises the race and nation of the Ottomans as Turkmans. But as the physique of the modern Turks contradicts this statement as to their affinity to the Mongols, it must be mentioned that the Turkish language, in its radicals, approaches nearer to the dialects of the Tartaric than to those of any other class; and that the wide difference in structure at the present day is explained by the fact, that the Turkish language has received so large an admixture of Arabic and Persian, as to be called Mulemma, or the pied horse. And as regards the people themselves, they are not less mixed than their language. For centuries they have been blended with the nations they have subdued. Persian, Circassian, Greek, Slavonian, and Gothic blood all course through the veins of a true Turk of the present day: and this clearly accounts for their differing so much from other nations of Tartar origin. They are in general a tall, robust, and well-formed race, with a tawny complexion, dark-brown hair, and fine facial development. Your true Turk looks every inch a gentleman by nature, and, with his natural gravity and long moustaches, quite as capable of freezing a parvenu as any English nobleman who foolishly fancies that the haughty exclusiveness of the middle ages is still tolerated in English middle-class society.

However, be the origin of the Turks as a nation what it may, the foundation of the Ottoman empire dates no further back than the days of Othman,* a Turcoman chieftain in the service of Aladdin, Sultan of Iconium, who firmly established himself on the banks of the Sangarius, in Asia Minor, at the base of the Great Olympus. He was situate on the verge of the Great Empire, and as the Koran sanctified a holy war against Christians, he availed himself of their political errors, to penetrate through the famous passes of the classic mountain, and overrun the plains of Bithynia. On the 27th of July, 1299,† he invaded Nicomedia, and rapidly approached the Bosphorus, the boundary between Asia and Europe. Othman reigned twenty-seven years, the whole of which were spent in conquest and rapine. He induced his hereditary troops to renounce the pastoral life for the excitement of war on a comprehensive scale, and the luxuries of an infant capital. In 1330, his son Orchan took Nice, and, after defeating and wounding the emperor, Andronicus the Younger, subdued the whole province of Bithynia, as far as the shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont. So that in his reign the Turks were only separated from the Greek empire in Europe by the Bosphorus, the sea of Marmora, and the Dardanelles, or the Hellespont of classic description.

The insane rivalry of the Latin and Greek churches favoured the designs of Orchan—for, being alternately the ally of one or the other, he steadily pursued his own schemes of aggrandisement. In his reign the Turks crossed the Hellespont, and fixed themselves at Gallipoli: so that they were approaching Constantinople by two routes—by the Bosphorus, which had yet to be crossed, and the Chersonesus, the land highway to the imperial city.

Amurath I., the son of Orchan, extended the Turkish conquests in Europe by fatally—for the eastern empire—chastising the warlike inhabitants of the Slavonian provinces between the Danube and the Adriatic. He was succeeded by the renowned Bajazet, and with him, it we may use the phrase, the romance of Turkish history commenced. His reign forms one of the most splendid epochs in the Turkish annals. Pursuing the plans and policy of his father, he led his triumphant armies from Boursa to Adrianople, and from the Danube to the Euphrates. No sooner had he imposed a regular form of servitude on the Bulgarians and Servians, than he passed the Danube, to seek new subjects in Moldavia. Whatever yet adhered to a Greek empire in Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly, acknowledged a Turkish master. An obsequious Greek bishop led him through the gates of Thermopylæ into Greece. Wherever he directed his arms, he was triumphant; and, no longer contented with the humble title of Emir, he proclaimed himself Sultan. His ambition being thus inflamed, he turned his arms against Hungary, the perpetual theatre of Turkish victories and defeats. Sigismund, the Hungarian King, was the son and brother of the emperors of the west; his cause was that of Europe and the Church: accordingly, on the report of his danger, the bravest knights of France and Germany were eager to march under his standard, and that of the cross. But Bajazet proved too good a general for the allied army. In the dreadful Battle of Nicopolis, he defeated the hundred thousand Christians, who had boasted that, if the sky should fall, they could uphold it on their lances. The majority were slain, or driven into the Danube. In this battle, it may be said that the spirit that animated the historical occurrences called the crusades was utterly destroyed. Thenceforth, politics and the exigencies of the age were to determine the boundaries of empires, and give a complexion to the wars and treaties of nations.

But Bajazet, after this overwhelming victory, had reached the term of his greatness. His conquests in Armenia and on the banks of the Euphrates had brought him in immediate contact with a Moslem conqueror of an ambition equally restless and insatiable, united to superior genius and exhaustless resources. This was the famous Tamerlane, who, resenting any conquests on the Asiatic continent, save by himself, soon provoked a quarrel with his rival in renown; and, after such interesting middle-age exploits as erecting a pyramid of 90,000 heads on the ruins of Bagdad, marched right into the heart of the Ottoman kingdom, and on the plains round the City of Angora, fought that memorable battle which led to the captivity and death of Bajazet, and placed his kingdom at the disposal of the Mogul conqueror. Very speedily all Asia, from the Irish and Volga to the Persian Gulf, and from the Ganges to Damascus and the Archipelago, was in the possession of Tamerlane, and he panted to penetrate into Europe. Had he done so, it is unquestionable that the destiny of Europe would have been changed, and the march of civilisation arrested for many a dreary age. Providence, however, willed that it should be otherwise.

Tamerlane had touched the utmost verge of the land, but an insuperable, though narrow sea rolled between the continents of Asia and Europe; and the lord of so many myriads of horse was not master of a single galley. The two passages—the Bosphorus and the Hellespont—were possessed, one by the Christians, the other by the Turks; and on this great occasion they forgot their difference of religion, to act with union and firmness against the common enemy. The mighty Mogul was baffled: and here we have an example in illustration of the present danger by which the Sultan—or rather the present possessor—of European Turkey is menaced. The Dardanelles and the Bosphorus, are now, as they were then, the keys of Constantinople; and had Tamerlane obtained possession of either, the Imperial City would have fallen, and he would have poured his irresistible cavalry over the face of Europe.

Thus arrested in his career, this ruthless exterminator of the human race would appear to have behaved generously. He reinstated the sons of Bajazet in their hereditary dominions, and the Ottoman empire in Asia, under its ancient name of Roum, or Roumelia, was numbered among the twenty-seven kingdoms which acknowledged the sovereignty of the mighty Tamerlane. Soliman, however, the eldest son of Bajazet, escaped from the field of battle into Europe, and was enabled to preserve the Ottoman name from the ignominy of total submission. After the death of Tamerlane, the division of the empire among his sons, their discord, and the ambition of his great captains, relieved the Turkish provinces from the Mogul yoke.

* In time, Othman became softened into Osman—whence Osmanlee, the national appellation of the Turks, which we translate into Ottoman.

† From this it would appear the Turkish power is just 554 years old.

Eleven years, however, elapsed, in the mutual endeavours of the sons of Bajazet to supplant each other, before Mahommed I. effected his final triumph, and assumed the title of Sultan. His successor, Amurath, whom Voltaire panegyrises as "Le Philosophe Turc," not only re-united the broken fragments of the empire, but subdued Serbia, Macedonia, Albania, Thessaly, and the whole of Greece, to the north of the isthmus. In his reign occurred the Battle of Varna, in which Ladislaus, King of Hungary, lost his life, and 10,000 Christians were slain—being the last combined effort of the Christians to check the progress of the Turkish power.

The magnanimous Amurath was succeeded, in 1451, by the conqueror of Constantinople—the accomplished, but cruel Mahommed II. Within two years after his accession to the throne, he took the last vestige of the Roman empire by storm, and completely subverted the Byzantine monarchy. By the fall of Constantinople he obtained the command of the Bosphorus, and became the most powerful monarch in the world. Indeed, it may safely be admitted, that he established the Ottoman empire on its present basis. His successors enlarged the empire. Selim I. subjugated Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Kourdistan, on the borders of Persia; and effected the conquest of Syria, Palestine, and Egypt. Soliman I. captured Rhodes and Hungary, and, after sacking the capital of Persia, obtained a considerable augmentation of territory beyond the Tigris; he also obtained the submission of Moldavia and the homage of Algiers; but the key to this magnificent empire was obtained by Mahommed II., when he became possessed of Constantinople. Thenceforth Turkey became consolidated, and attained the culminating point in its greatness under Soliman and his two immediate successors. With the reign of Murad III., which commenced in 1574, the Ottoman power began to decline. And here, in this year 1853, we are presented with the remarkable fact, that the rise and decline of this once colossal empire occupied about the same periods of time. From 1299—when Othman founded a Turkish kingdom in Bithynia—to 1574, when Murad was involved in damaging hostilities with Persia and Austria, is a period of 275 years; and from 1574 to the present year is a period of 279 years: so that, should Turkey be dismembered this year, or next, or within the next quarter of a century, her rise and her fall may practically, or at all events, in a political sense—for the year 1299 is only fixed by the invasion of Nicomedia—be said to have occupied pretty nearly the same divisions of time.

However, we are not about to enter upon discursive theories that may lead to something like a chapter on destiny, or engage in speculations as to the probable duration of the Turkish empire. Our present object is to point to the historical fact, that Constantinople fell through the Turks having crossed the Bosphorus, and obtained a footing in European Turkey. Had they been restricted to Asia, as Tamerlane was, the Greek empire might still have been in existence; but, having effected the passage of the Bosphorus, the fall of the Cæsars became only a question of time.

As in the days of Constantine and Tamerlane, whoever has the possession of the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus, has virtually the possession of Constantinople. This is admitted by all classes of politicians; and as Russia—a power which it would not be ridiculous to say has, within two centuries, grown up to be a giant at the back and neglected door of Turkey—now menaces the integrity of that country from the Black Sea, of which it has the undisputed sovereignty, we must explain the exact position of the Ottoman capital and of its navigable approaches.

Constantinople stands on a neck of land which runs into the Sea of Marmora, at the point where the latter receives the waters of the Bosphorus: so that it has the Bosphorus on its eastern boundary, the Sea of Marmora on its southern, the harbour of Perami on the northern, and the continent of ancient Thrace on the western. The Sea of Marmora is connected with the Greek Archipelago, and, as a matter of course, the Mediterranean, by means of the Hellespont, or Dardanelles, a great natural canal; and with the Black Sea by means of the Bosphorus, also a natural canal. The situation is considered the best in the world, for the two canals give Constantinople a share in the commerce of both the east and the west.

Before the discovery of the passage to India—by way of the Cape of Good Hope—Turkey enjoyed almost a monopoly of the commerce between the eastern and western hemispheres; and no doubt that discovery hastened her decline, and largely contributed to pave the way to her ultimate downfall. But with all the advantages attending them, these two canals or gates to Constantinople may be opened by an enemy. No danger menaces Turkey from the west—so that the Sublime Porte is under no apprehension of a foe forcing the passage of the Dardanelles; it is on the east that all his tribulation lies. The Bosphorus is the watery link between the Sea of Marmora and the Black Sea.

Little did Constantine think, when he founded what he considered an impregnable capital on the shores of the Propontis, that on the territories bordering the dismal and turbulent Black Sea, a people would accumulate in such numbers as not only to be able, in the absence of the interposition of powers equally great, to demolish his pet city in a month or two, but, if they chose, to overrun every inch of territory Rome formerly possessed in the East. But so it is; and as the western powers—especially England and France—do not consider it safe, or consistent with their policy, to submit to the sacrifice of European Turkey, and so admit the Russians into maritime competition with them on the waters of the Mediterranean, coalesced to prevent such an aggression, the Sultan, of course, entering into their views, had no objection to open the Dardanelles gate to his friends—so that they might, with their big ships, tremendous cannon, and brave men, prevent the enemy from approaching the gate of the Bosphorus, with the ambitious intention of battering it in with the sledge-hammer of war, to enable him to snuff out the Turkish empire as easily as a lady would extinguish a candle. The game of Turkish politics is to let a friend in at one door, to keep out an enemy knocking lustily at another. When it will be played out, it is, perhaps, not our business to inquire; but as the public attention has been attracted to this part of the eastern world by the alarming occurrences of the summer, we thought it our duty to make our readers acquainted with some of the pictorial features of this celebrated and—for Turkey certainly—alarmingly dangerous outlet from the Black Sea, of which the Czar of Russia is undoubted master.

The length of the Bosphorus is about twenty miles, and at the Constantinople terminus the depth of the water close on the shore is so considerable, that line-of-battle ships may be anchored so as to touch the wooden wharfs. The classical student ascending this interesting channel, will have pointed out to him the precise spots where the Persians, Goths, Latins, and the Ottomans, successively effected a passage. A sail on its waters would, indeed, carry him on the wings of imagination into the regions of the romantic and mystic past; but as he passed by villages, ruined fortresses, and majestic-looking palaces, he could not fail to observe the extreme beauty of the scenery. Here nature is arrayed in some of her loveliest garments. In some places the Bosphorus appears like a majestic river winding between banks as high and woody as those of the Wye, and not less lively and cultivated than those of the Thames.

With regard to the origin of the word Bosphorus, we incline to the opinion that the strait derived its name from the passage of the Persian elephants, which the Greeks and Thracians, having no other appellation for, called bos leucos—white bulls. The ancient poets, as all our young readers know, attribute the derivation of the name to the passage of the metamorphosed Io.

Our illustration gives a view of the mouth of the Bosphorus and the capital, taken from a point on the Asiatic shore; probably one of the very points on which Tamerlane stood, mentally exclaiming: "A galley—a galley! my empire for a galley, to wait me over to that capital whose gilded palaces, churches, and towers sparkle so gloriously in the mid-day sun!" The scene is as brilliant in the present day, with the additional attraction of the presence in the channel of hundreds of galleys, large ships laden with merchandise from every part of the world, and men-of-war looking the defiance they, perhaps, could not hurl. The innumerable minarets, the domes, the towers skirting the water's edge, most of them gilded; and the houses, whose roofings, terraces, balconies, and gardens form a variety of amphitheatres, constitute an ensemble which, for beauty and splendour, is without a parallel in the world.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

There is no pain like love to hatred turned
Or greater fury than a woman scorned.

OLD PLAY.

CATHERINE DE MEDICIS, the Queen Mother of France, was not only one of the most ambitious but one of the most unscrupulous women of the time, and would willingly have sacrificed the happiness of her son—the handsome, gallant Duc D'Anjou—by forcing him into a marriage with Elizabeth, despite the repugnance which the high-spirited youth felt at the idea of espousing a woman old enough to be his mother. A letter was sent by the French king, and delivered to Elizabeth by his ambassador, La Motte, making a formal tender of his brother's hand: which said letter, according to Fénelon, she received with great apparent satisfaction, and referred him to those members of her privy council who were in her confidence, to arrange the conditions.

This time the royal spinster appears to have been serious in her intention of changing her state. She even consented that the duke should have the title of king, and in the event of a child being born of the marriage—after the death of her majesty—he should bear the title of king-father; and if no child should live to succeed, king-dowager.

We have before spoken of the repugnance of the young Duc D'Anjou to the match—which, from the known fickleness of the English queen, he trusted would be broken off. In private he never hesitated to speak of her not only in the most opprobrious but contemptuous terms—which licence was speedily reported by Elizabeth's spies, and filled her with bitter mortification and anger. Unfortunately, the name of her prisoner, the beautiful and unhappy Mary, was mixed up in these reports. When the wily Frenchman waited upon her majesty at Hampton Court, he saw, from the coldness with which she regarded him, that something had occurred to ruffle the temper of the royal fiancée. La Motte could flatter, perhaps, better than any man of his time; but for once his oily compliments were ill received—particularly one in which he alluded to the approaching happiness of the Duc D'Anjou.

"What, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, with an ugly old creature, who for the last year has had the evil in her leg! You jest!"

These were the very words which her spies in France had reported to her: and some sort of credibility was given to them, from the fact of her having lately suffered severely from lameness.

La Motte was thunderstruck, and Elizabeth heartily enjoyed his confusion.

"A noble project—was it not?" she continued. "The duke to marry me, in the hope of my not surviving a year!"

"Ah, madam!"

"Or if I do," added the royal vixen, "a potion is to be sent from France, that the honourable widower may espouse my cousin, the Queen of Scots! Never stare and look, my lord, as if you had heard these things for the first time! They are commonly spoken of in France. If I blush at repeating them, it is not on my own account, but for the honour of the regal house of France."

A few days afterwards, Elizabeth—to vindicate the honour of her insulted leg—danced, on a Sunday, at the Marquis of Northampton's wedding: of which she took care to inform the ambassador at the next interview.

It was at this period of her life that the maiden queen displayed that relentless cruelty of character which she inherited from her tyrant father. Walsingham—who was her minister in France—informed her that, dissatisfied with her delays, the court of France was in treaty for a marriage between the Duc d'Anjou and the captive Mary, and that the Pope had already granted a dispensation on account of their propinquity. Our readers can well imagine the rage, mortification, and jealousy of the royal spinster at the intelligence. Mary, whom she both feared and hated—a captive—preferred to her! She manifested her resentment by such harsh treatment of her captive, that the nobility of her own kingdom began to murmur, and the different courts of Europe cried shame on her proceedings.

Whilst things were in this state, the French and Spanish ambassadors both demanded an audience. Elizabeth appointed an interview on the following Sunday, after prayers. She was then residing at her favourite palace at Greenwich.

Elizabeth encountered the two diplomats in the Prince's Gallery—which connected the chapel with the royal apartments—as she passed in her usual state, attended by the highest nobility in the realm. All those on whom she cast a look, bent the knee before her—to persons of very great distinction she gave her hand to kiss. Her appearance at this period—judging from her portrait, by Zuccherò—must have resembled the old figure which formerly adorned the Church of St. Dunstan in the West.

Her petticoat, of cloth of gold, worked with pearls, stood out in all the dignity of hoop and whalebone—the stomacher, which matched the purple cut velvet of her robe and bodice, being thickly studded with diamonds. Like most unmarried ladies, she wore her neck and bosom exposed in front—but the shoulders were hidden by the enormous ruff, which it is supposed she first affected to hide a deformity in her throat. As for the head-dress, the structure must have been the result of no small labour and patience on the part of her tirewomen.

A huge mass of artificial red hair, bespangled with jewels, linked together by small chains—each curl gummed to keep it in its place—and surmounted at the top by an arched crown.

In addition to her other jewels, Elizabeth wore the garter, and the matchless collar of rubies so long the ornament of the regalia of England, but which was broken up and sold during the civil wars.

The moment her majesty perceived M. La Motte, the smile left her face, and a dark frown succeeded. Although the ambassador, from his elegant manners and courtly tongue, was a personal favourite with her, she would willingly have received him in the royal closet; but the Frenchman had his instructions, and, bowing profoundly, he stood full in her passage, and presented a letter. It was impossible for her to do otherwise than take it.

"A strange communication," observed the gaoler of Mary Stuart, "from our brother Charles!"

It had not been the wish of Elizabeth that the subject of the letter should be discussed so openly; and scarcely had the words escaped her lips, than she regretted them. The wily Frenchman saw the advantage, and was too much of a tactician not to seize it.

"Your majesty cannot be surprised," he observed, "that my royal master should feel pity and sympathy for his captive sister-in-law, or forget that she has worn the crown of France; and that, unless Mary were treated in a manner suited to her dignity, he would be compelled, by the indignation of his nobility, as well as the consideration of the honour of his house, to send an army into England for her deliverance."

"God's death!" exclaimed the thoroughly incensed majesty of England; "let them come! Little we fear or heed them!"

Cecil, who was standing close to his mistress, whispered a few words in her ear. The effort which Elizabeth made to restrain her anger was apparent to all; but she did restrain it, and added, in a tone of hypocritical sentimentality:

"No wonder, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, that I am vexed, when I find my brother of France—whom I so highly esteem—prize the friendship of my enemy before mine! It is that which moves me!"

"The Lady Mary," observed La Motte, "is the sister-in-law of his most Christian Majesty!"

"And am I so very far," adroitly replied the royal coquette, "from becoming so, that he prefers her interests to mine?"

This was in allusion to the treaty of marriage between herself and the young Duc D'Anjou, which she affected to consider as not entirely broken off. This time, however, the diplomat, who had long felt assured that the union would never take place—not only on account of the prince's disgust, but her own fickleness of character—looked blank, as if he did not comprehend her.

"Besides," continued the speaker, "the Queen of Scots is my most bitter enemy! At the time of my accession, she openly assumed the title to my crown; and both previous to her coming into my kingdom, and since, hath plotted continually against me! Still," she added, "for the sake of our good brother of France, we will put it to our council what we can do, consistent with the safety of our realm, to pleasure him touching this matter."

With these words, which prudence dictated, and hypocrisy uttered, the speaker would have passed on; but behind La Motte stood the minister of Spain, to present a letter from his sovereign.

The cause of dispute was the right of executing Dr. Storey—then in his eightieth year—on a charge of magic and treason. This zealous divine, in the reign of Mary, had openly preached in convocation—where the means of extirpating the new heresy had been debated on—that it was useless attempting to destroy the branches, whilst the root of the evil remained. This was an attack which Elizabeth—whom the preacher had imprudently alluded to by name—never forgave. Aware of his danger, Dr. Storey, on her accession, fled to Spain, and entered the service of Philip; but, after a lapse of many years, he was captured on board an English vessel, and, upon a ridiculous charge of magic, as well as treason, condemned to death.

"What!" exclaimed Elizabeth, with a burst of indignation, as soon as she had perused the letter which the Spanish minister had presented to her. "Philip claims my subject! Was he not born in England? Answer me that!"

"Doubtless, your majesty!" replied the envoy. "But the number of years he has been in Spain give him the rights of naturalisation. My royal master, therefore—"

"May have his head, if he wishes it!" sarcastically interrupted the royal virago, whose spirit was thoroughly roused—for she felt that this time she was standing upon her right; "but his body shall remain in England, where he hath been lawfully judged and tried! What!" she added, scornfully, "if the hound escapes the leash, may he not be reclaimed? Am I to lose my rights over my own born subject, because, forsooth, he prefers the service of Spain to mine? No—no! God's death! We are not feeble yet! The aged traitor dies!"

She kept her word; and, despite the entreaties of the ambassador, who descended to employ them, when he found menaces of so little avail, Elizabeth caused him to be beheaded. His fate excited little sympathy; and perhaps merited none—for he had been a relentless persecutor of the Protestants, when in power. Still it would have been wiser and nobler to have pardoned him. The ridiculous crime of magic, mixed up with the real charge on which he was tried, leads one to suspect that the evidence of treasonable practices was anything but clear.

CHAPTER XLIX.

The statesman's cunning beats not woman's wit.
SPANISH PROVERB.

WHETHER the reluctance of Elizabeth to a wedded life in her youth was real or affected, one thing at least is certain—that she was sincere in her wish to espouse at the age of thirty-nine, the Duke D'Anjou, who was reported to be one of the handsomest men of the age. Perhaps she was led to this desire from a threefold motive: first, a personal predilection—as she had expressed herself exceedingly satisfied with his portrait; next, a desire of having issue of her own—which would put an end to all dispute touching the succession to her crown—a continual source of uneasiness and annoyance to her; and, lastly, the desire of mortifying and humbling the captive Queen of Scots, to whom the young prince had offered his hand. Such an union would have deprived Mary of her best friend—for the interests of the French and English courts would then have been one.

The great difficulty appears to have been in granting to the intended husband the exercise of his religion—which he obstinately persisted in demanding, contrary to the advice of his mother, Catherine de Medici, who repeatedly urged him to waive his scruples, and exchange the mass for the crown matrimonial of England. But the temptation was by no means strong enough—and so the negotiations flagged. But, on the Emperor of Germany, Maximilian, offering his eldest son as a suitor for the hand of the virgin queen, and a favourable answer being returned, all that intrigue or ambition could devise was put in practice by the court of France, to renew the half-broken treaty. Elizabeth caught at the bait, and expressed a wish that her suitor should visit England—which the young prince positively refused, as beneath his dignity, till the treaty should be actually signed: a resolution which, as will be seen by the following letter, greatly enraged and disappointed his ambitious, politic mother:

"Monsieur de la Motte Feneion,—"

"As I place particular confidence in you, I will not hide from you that the humour in which I find my son Anjou, has given me great pain. He is utterly determined not to go over to England, without having a public assurance for the open exercise of his religion; and neither the king nor I can prevail on him to rely on the word of the Queen of England. We suspect, very strongly, that Villegier, Lignerolles, or Saurer—possibly all three together—are the originators of these fantasies. If we could have assurance that such were the case, I can assure you that they should repent of it.

"For all this, I would not that we reveal it, since it is possible we may work something on his mind, or on that of the queen (Elizabeth.)"

"If, unfortunately, matters do not accord for my son (Anjou) as I could wish, I am resolved to try all efforts to succeed with my son Alençon, who would not be so difficult. Meantime, as we propose to make a league with this queen, to attach her the more to us, and distance the son of the emperor and others, let no hint of this appear; but burn this present, after having read it, and believe nothing that may be told you, and nothing that is written to you, save that which bears the king's signature or mine; and this you are told not without reason—for those who desire not that things should be as they are (thanks be to God), so well advanced and disposed to be successful, have artifices enough to write and publish which they think may hinder the good work. Praying to God for you, &c., &c."

"At Fontainebleu, this Thursday, xxv. day of July, 1571. "CATHERINE."

The Duc D'Alençon, who was remarkable for the plainness as well as the insignificance of his person, was not at all to the taste of Elizabeth. The negotiations were never brought to bear in his favour, even as far as they had been for his brother—whom she at last not only promised to marry, but to accord the free exercise of his religion in private.

It was the refusal of accepting this private arrangement—which Anjou considered as ill according with his honour—which caused the above letter to be written.

In the midst of these intrigues, the Duke of Norfolk had secretly resumed his treaty with the captive Queen of Scots—who, naturally impatient of the restraint in which she had so long been treacherously detained, lent a willing ear to any scheme which promised liberty.

In an evil hour, both Mary and the duke listened to the suggestion of one Rodolfi, a Florentine banker, whom they commissioned to apply to the Duke of Alva, in the Low Countries, for assistance in effecting the restoration of the former to her kingdom. The minister of Spain lent a willing ear to the proposal, and promised to send ten thousand men in the ensuing spring. This correspondence was intercepted by the agents of Elizabeth, who immediately ordered the arrest of the Duke of Norfolk, and the application of the torture to his two servants, Barker and Bannister, who were made prisoners with him, in order to extort from their agonies something to criminate their master.

The order, with detailed directions how the rack should be applied, we regret to say, was written by the queen's own hand.

When the cunning Florentine—the original cause of so much mischief—was brought before the council, he confessed that the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Bishop of Ross were the heads of the conspiracy—the purport of which was to assassinate Elizabeth: which accusation Norfolk indignantly denied, stating that he would have died a thousand deaths rather than have consented to such an infamy.

This declaration may be looked upon as truth. The unfortunate nobleman possessed more chivalry than wit. He was a weak, not a bad man. There is little doubt that he loved the unfortunate Mary, who appears to have returned his passion.

It is an illustration to the whole line of Norfolk, for one of its members to have been beloved by such a woman, and partially redeems the nonentity and ridicule into which it has since fallen.

The Duke of Norfolk was at last condemned—but for once Elizabeth showed signs of mercy. The unfortunate nobleman was so nearly related to her, that, had he consented to put it out of his own power to fulfil the engagement of marriage between himself and Mary, by wedding another, his life, in all probability, would have been spared. The party selected was no other than the sister of Burleigh—who by this means would have allied his own blood indirectly with the crown. It would be curious to speculate on what politic schemes were passing in the head of the unscrupulous statesman, when he first decided on making the prisoner an offer of his life on the above condition. It was, however, firmly declined; and from that hour the minister became his deadliest enemy.

It was not, however, the influence or the intrigues of Norfolk's two great enemies, Burleigh and Leicester, which decided the death of that unfortunate nobleman—but a letter which the former intercepted, written by Mary to Alva, in which the captive queen recommended the Spanish duke to send a force from Spain to carry off her son, whom she wished to remain under the guardianship of the king, his master.

"This must be seen to," exclaimed Elizabeth, deeply moved, as her minister read to her, in the royal closet, the paragraph of the letter. "The infant King of Scots, in such hands, would prove a worse thorn in our side than any yet! God!" she hypocritically added, "what an unnatural mother!"

The inconsistency of this speech could not have escaped the observation of Burleigh—who, by her command, had proposed to the captive queen the surrender of her son, as one of the preliminary conditions of her liberty: a condition which Mary nobly rejected.

"It is not all," observed the minister.

"Proceed, my lord!" said the queen, impatiently.

"In England," continued Mary, "there are many who feel the cruel wrongs I have endured at the hands of Elizabeth, and are favourable to my cause: some are in prison—but those she will not dare to touch."

"Will I not!" exclaimed the queen, starting from her seat. "We shall see whether I fear to take the head of the noblest or most powerful in my realm—if they merit death by conspiracy against my crown! Let orders be issued," she added, harshly, "for the execution of the duke to-morrow!"

This was the point Burleigh wished to bring her to but he was too politic to let the least trace of the satisfaction he felt appear upon his features. He merely seconded her majesty, and, advancing to the table in the centre of the room, took from it a sheet of paper, which he placed upon a portfolio, and held it upon his knees before her, at the same time presenting the pen.

"What is this for?" sharply demanded Elizabeth.

"The sign manual!"

"There!" she said, with a sarcastic smile, at the same time tracing the regal characters; "there is my reply to the insolent boast of my cousin Mary!"

The order, however, was, after some little reflection, cancelled, as were several succeeding ones: not from any real pity or reluctance to shed blood, but from that hypocrisy which had now become her second nature.

Elizabeth waited only till parliament should address her, to permit the execution to take place—she showed no reluctance then.

The following letter, written by the greatest of England's queens—as she has been called by lying historians and flatterers—addressed by her to her royal captive, is extracted from the Cottonian MS. Its authenticity has never been questioned.

What a picture of coarse, brutal harshness does it not present! Written to a woman whom she treacherously held prisoner—a cousin, and an independent sovereign, like herself!

Oh, the days of good Queen Bess!

"February 1st, 1571-2.

"Madam,—Of late time I have received divers letters from you, to the which, you may well guess, by the accidents of the time, why I have not made any answer, but specially because I saw no matter in them that required any answer, as could have contented you; and to have discontented you, had been but an increase of your impatience, which I thought time would have mitigated, as it commonly doth, where the cause thereof is not truly grounded, and that it be so understood; but now, finding by your last letter, the 27th of the last (month), an increase of your impatience, tending, also, to many uncomely, passionate, and vindictive speeches, I thought to change my former opinion, and, by patient and advised words, to move you to stay, or else to qualify your passions, and to consider that it is not the manner to obtain good things with evil speeches, nor benefits with injurious challenges, nor to get good to yourself with doing evil to another.

"And yet, to avoid the fault which I note you have committed, in filling a long letter with a multitude of sharp and injurious words, I will not, by way of letter, write any more of the matter, but have rather chosen to commit to my cousin, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the things which I have thought meet, upon the reading of your letters, to be imparted unto you, as in a memorial, in writing, he hath to shew you; wherewith I think, if reason be present with you, and passion absent at the reading, you will follow, hereafter, rather the course of the last part of your letter than the first, the latter being written as in a calm, and the former in a storm. Wishing you the same grace of God that I wish to myself, and that he may direct you to desire and attain to that which is meet for His honour, and your quietness, with contentation both of body and mind. Given at my Palace of Westminster, the 1st day of February, 1571-2.

"Your cousin, that wisheth you a better mind,
"ELIZABETH."

THE SECOND SIGHT.

A FEW years ago, in the Scottish Highlands, the chapter of accidents threw me into chance companionship with a gentleman, in whose society a wet evening passed on pleasantly and rapidly, in conversation upon a variety of subjects, which turned, at length, to The Second Sight, which even yet is claimed for a few ancient families—those of indisputable Celtic descent. It was not until he saw that I possessed some hereditary respect for the superstition in question, and was not much of a sceptic as to the grounds for crediting it, that I could get my companion to discuss it with the freedom which had previously characterised our discourse upon other topics.

"In my own family," said he, "the Second Sight has been exercised from time immemorial. In other Scottish families—or rather in the few which also possess this prophetic vision—the gift has descended from father to son; in ours, from a circumstance which it would be tedious to relate, it has been delivered by the succession from grandfather to grandson—there always being the lapse of one, in its exercise by the respective parties. Thus, supposing that your grandfather possessed this gift, it would not descend to your father, but the line of succession would be continued to you.

"My grandfather, who resided near Culloeden Moor, had taken a wife shortly before the second Jacobite outbreak. On the morning of the 16th of April, 1746, he sat down to breakfast with such a grave countenance, that his bride was induced to inquire what circumstance had gloomed it. He attempted to evade the inquiry, which her womanly affection and curiosity had made; but she pressed him so closely on the point, that he confessed to having seen a shadow of coming evil—that, in a word, he had beheld, by anticipation, a bloody fight, close to their habitation, in which the defeat of the kilted Highlanders, by the red-coat soldiers of the Hanoverian Dynasty, clearly intimated the downfall of the Chevalier's cause.

"My grandfather was himself a well-wisher to the Stuarts, and the head of our clan had forfeited his earldom and estates, and had narrowly escaped with life, on account of his active participation in the Rebellion of 1715. 'But,' said my grandfather, 'I saw also, my Isabella, that we shall receive a gallant and Royal leader under our roof this evening. It can be no other than The Prince, and it behoves you to make the best preparation for him.' In Scotland, at that time, the wife's motto was to hear and to obey: and she who was thus spoken to, hastened to put her house in order, and make it ready for the reception of the visioned guest. A few minutes before midnight, the tramp of cavalry was heard approaching. It came near—nearer. The horses drew up at my grandfather's gate. A loud knocking brought out the inmates, and they received as a claimant on their hospitality one who certainly was a Royal leader, but not exactly him whom they expected. Instead of bonny Prince Charlie, it was the Duke of Cumberland, then a strong, active man, who was five-and-twenty on that very day."

"His advent," said I, "must have been something of a disappointment?"

"It was. The duke had ridden forward from Nairn, in pursuit, and he sat up during the greater part of the night, merely snatching an hour's sleep on the bed, without taking off his clothes. He quitted the house at daybreak, and the most noticeable thing remembered of him was, that he ate most voraciously, and took enormous quantities of snuff. He demanded the loan of a snuff-box, as he went away. The worst in the house—namely, a common Scotch mull—was filled and handed to him; for, sooth to say, independent of my grandfather's sympathies being with the Stuarts, he never expected to see his box again. Two or three days after the battle, however, a soldier rode up to the house, asked for its occupant by name, and restored him the box, with the duke's compliments and thanks! When opened, it was found to be filled with gold. In this manner, the duke had chosen to make his acknowledgments for the night's lodging which had been unwillingly afforded him. The box, thus honoured by having been used by the Duke of Cumberland, during the eventful day of Culloden, has been preserved in our family as a sort of heir-loom—and you may see it now, if you have the slightest curiosity."

In compliance with my desire, the box was produced. It was a very plain Scotch mull, without the slightest ornament, except a small silver tip on the cover, by which to open it, and a slight rim of the same material round the top. On the cover had been rudely scratched something like a shield, containing what I was herald enough to designate as "a stag's head, cabossed."

"I keep this box," said its owner, "precisely as it was delivered to me—the only portion of my father's property that ever came into my possession after his death. Not having the smaller vices of smoking or snuffing—indeed, having as much antipathy for 'the weed' as ever King James had—I yet keep it as a memorial of its last, rather than its original possessor."

"Yet," said I, "if it does not 'point a moral,' you are now making it 'adorn a tale.'"

"We have another memorial of the fatal contest at Culloden," said he, "to which the Jacobite feelings of my family have attached a value more relative than real. For my own part, I have always thought it fortunate that this country had a happy riddance of the Stuarts—a race at once weak and wilful, headstrong and tyrannic. The nation acted well in calling to the throne a prince of its own choice—thus establishing the principle of an elective monarchy. The Battle of Culloden, as you know, was the death-blow to the Chevalier's hopes. There is little doubt, now, that the unfortunate prince behaved, in that battle, with spirit and bravery. His earnest desire was to rally the Highlanders, broken by the first deadly discharge of the English artillery—to lead them on—and to risk all on that hazard. But Sir Thomas Sullivan seized his bridle, turned his horse round, and conducted him off the field. You know how many and what romantic adventures he passed through, before, with a sum of £30,000 on his head, he finally effected his escape to Brittany. On one of these occasions, it was my grandfather's good fortune to render him a signal service, at the risk of his own life; and, when they parted company, the Chevalier put his miniature into his hands, saying: 'If ever fortune should smile upon me, let me see this, and you shall find me not ungrateful!' This is the miniature, which we have carefully retained in our family, in memory of the Prince."

He handed me an oval miniature, plainly set in gilded brass—such as, in later days, was called pinchbeck, from the jeweller who introduced it. The resemblance was not to be mistaken. The light hair, blue eyes, and elongated features of the Chevalier have often been described, and are well known. There was the blue ribbon of the Garter, the star of that order on the breast, the lace cravat, the coat of greyish blue tartan striped with red, and the crimson mantle with ermine bordering. Such was the likeness, such the habiliments and adornments of the unfortunate Chevalier. I would prefer that portrait, in its humble setting, to the resemblance of any living royalty. What a moral did it suggest!

I inquired of my friend whether, having made such a successful first appearance as a seer, his grandfather had experienced any more visions.

"Certainly. Having made a commencement so promising, he continued to exercise the faculty. The last session, which was more than half a century after—for he lived to extreme old age—was one which such of his descendants as heard of it were not likely to forget. My father, being of a 'truant disposition,' like Horatio in the play, took French leave of his birth-place when he had scarcely reached his eighteenth year. The fifteen years following witnessed his wanderings through all quarters of the globe; and during all that time he most undutifully neglected to hold any communication with his family by letter. It was generally believed by his kinsmen that he was dead; but his father constantly declared that he felt to the contrary, and his mother fondly clung to the same belief, with the trust which a mother's feelings alone can retain—for hers was that hoping against hope, which believes rather what it wishes, than what circumstances might make it fear as only too probable. At last, when his very memory was almost forgotten, except by his parents, the long absent re-appeared in the scenes of his youth. The manner in which he was received, as I have heard him relate it, was inexpressibly striking. The father, white with the snow and bowed with the ailments of more than eighty years, had maintained most of his mental faculties unimpaired, and was cherished, amid his children and his children's children, as a venerable patriarch—a living link between the past and the present. On the thirty-third anniversary of the birth-day of the absent son—which they had continued to celebrate rather from custom than from a belief in his existence—the old man suddenly exclaimed, fixing his eyes intently on the open window: 'I see the return of the absent: to-night—even to-night—his voice will sound in the house wherein he first drew breath!' Not a word more did he say; but his wife, who had the fullest confidence in his Second Sight, ordered that preparations should instantly be made for the reception of a guest. The day had far declined, and no visitor appeared. The younger members of the family smiled, in scepticism, at the non-fulfilment of their grandfather's prediction. At last, when it was now almost midnight, a step was heard outside. The window had been left open, and through it, though rather an unusual mode of entrance, bounded in the robust man, bronzed with foreign travel, who had left the place when a lad. No one recognised him, except his aged parents. He bent on his knee before his father, for a blessing; when the old man, laying his hands upon the head of the long absent, fervently blessed him, and then exclaimed, in thankfulness: 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace!' Some time was spent in questions and replies, and, rather early in the morning, the happy family retired to rest. When they had arisen, and assembled round the breakfast-table, it was noticed that my grandfather's seat was vacant. One of his daughters went to summon him. Why need I prolong my story? She found him dead. By his side was his wife, sleeping in happy unconsciousness of her loss. If ever a heart had broken with joy, it was that old man's. Was I wrong in saying that there was something striking in the wanderer's return to his native hills?"

My companion did not much hesitate, at my urgent request, to state the instances in which, in his own person, the faculty of Second Sight had been manifested. They were related, as matters of fact, with such an apparent faith in their reality—and it should be remembered that the narrator was now drawing upon his own experience, in which there was scarcely any chance of a mistake—that Doubt itself would be almost silenced, if, even as I did, it had heard the story told so much more impressively than I can pretend to repeat it.

"According to what is understood to be the usual custom in our family," said he, "the faculty of Second Sight descends from grand sire to grandson, passing over the entire intermediate descendants. None of my grandfather's sons, therefore, could expect to be endowed with it; and of his many grandsons, there appeared little chance that I—born, too, out of Scotland, and from a Saxon mother—should inherit it. Least of all did such an idea cross my own mind for a moment. I was in my fourteenth year, and had proceeded to spend my school vacation with relations in the country. My father, when I left home, was in the enjoyment of that rude health which had always distinguished him, and made him then, though in his sixtieth year, a much stronger man than many who were his juniors by ten or fifteen years. I was in the country, when, one morning, it chanced that I sat alone—if I can say that I was alone, with one of Scott's novels in my hand—when, happening to raise my eyes towards the fire-place, over which was placed a large mirror, I saw my father standing by it, with his arm resting on the chimney-piece. My first impulse was to jump from my chair, throw aside my book, and hastily advance to him. He did not stir, and his eyes, as they looked at another object, appeared dull and glassy. I had scarcely taken a second step forward, when I noticed that I could see into the mirror, through my father, and that he cast no image or reflection on the glass. The thought that there was something strange in this, rushed into my mind. My advancing steps were suddenly arrested by this thought, and a horror struck through my frame. I remember nothing more, except that, late in the day, I found myself in bed, and was told by one of my cousins that I had been found senseless on the floor, and that I had been bled by the medical gentleman who had been called in to see me. I could not resist the impulse, even at the risk of being laughed at, of whispering to my cousin the cause of my sudden illness. As might be expected, she laughed at it, and said she hoped I would not be so foolish as to dream of such things. But, on the third day after, a letter from home told me that my father had died, at the precise time when I saw what I believed to be his actual presence. He had been visited by a sudden ailment, which rapidly terminated in his death. Why this should have occurred—for it did occur, as certainly as I am now telling it to you—I am unable to explain. I only relate a simple fact, which neither time, change, nor circumstances can obliterate from my memory."

After a silence of some duration—for there was subject for meditation in what I had heard—I ventured to ask on what other occasions he had experienced the faculty.

"The second, and only other instance, occurred," said he, "not very long ago, when I was in my twenty-third year. I cannot account for the impulse which prompts me to converse thus freely with a stranger, on a subject of this kind; but I feel that, even if you do not believe, you will not ridicule what I tell you: and the overloaded mind is sometimes glad to have an auditor respecting the superstition—if such it be—to whom, even if he do not share its peculiar shades of speculation, it may unburthen itself without reserve."

"When I had reached my seventeenth year—that age when the girl has softly glided into the woman, and the youth can scarcely be said to do more than stand on the threshold of manhood, though he yearns, most sinlessly, for the soft companionship which soothes, and softens, and refines his nature—it was my fortune to be thrown a good deal into the society of a very charming girl of my own age—a distant relative. I need not fatigue you with a description of the young lady. Beautiful she certainly was—at least, so I thought, and think—but the peculiar character of that loveliness I feel that words could never correctly make known to you. But, indeed, the mere attractions of form and feature would not by themselves have charmed me at any time. I found that she had a clear, thoughtful, well-informed intellect—and I have ever believed it is the mind that makes the body beautiful. In the strange old country-house which was her dwelling-place, and with no other being, of either sex, of an age at all near my own, it is scarcely wonderful—to say nothing of the young lady's own attractions—that I very speedily became enamoured of her. Nor was it a trifling consolation to know that the fancy, or the passion—for it was as much of sentiment as sense—was as reciprocal as heart could desire. Well do I remember, even as it were yesterday, when I first dared say in words—what my eyes had told long before—how dearly I loved her. And her reply: it was given, not in uttered language, but in the low and relieving sigh which speaks, even in its silence. The blush upon her cheeks—the heaving of her bosom—the sudden tears springing into her dark-blue eyes (like the dew trembling on the violets)—gave me the glad assurance that I did not sue in vain. Even yet, though years have passed away, the memory of that first hour of mutually-confessed affection is graven in my heart. Well, it is some consolation that, when Hope leaves us, Memory remains to solace us, however sadly."

"It would be a bad reward for the patience with which, my dear sir, you have listened to all this egotism, to try it further by inflicting upon you an account of all the tenderness of protestation and promise which followed the mutual confession I spoke of. The truth is, we were thrown much together, when we had nothing to do but fall in love with each other, at the most susceptible period of the threescore and ten years allotted to human life—and we certainly fulfilled our destiny. Vows of eternal constancy we exchanged, of course, and wisely agreed that, at a fit and future period, we should be espoused. And so we parted. My lot was speedily cast in the midst of the business and bustle of the world, in which I had to win subsistence and reputation; and here was destined to glide on in quiet, first in the home which is so haunted with recollections of the past, that it would be a positive pain for me now to revisit it, and finally in a sequestered village in the most beautiful part of the south of France. Our correspondence gradually became less frequent than it had been at first; and I must admit, on my own part, that at last, when I had formed new ties, it wholly ceased."

"I remember how—for our conversation was often on subjects beyond our years—we had often spoken together of that world beyond the grave, of which so little is known—so much vainly guessed."

"I believe," said she, who was fond of such speculations, 'that disembodied spirits may hover around those whom they loved on earth, and,' she added, with more solemnity than I fancied the occasion warranted, 'it should be so, be assured that I shall first use my privilege to watch over you, and—if it be permitted—even to be visitant visible to you.'

"I smiled at the promise thus made, half in sport. I knew not then how Truth may lurk amid the smiles of mirth."

"Many years passed on. The sanguine youth had gradually changed into the man of the world, struggling for fortune, and striving, in that struggle, to gain that fame which, when gained, is unsubstantial as the gorgeous domes, and towers, and mountains, and islands, to which fancy finds resemblance in the sky, on the eve of a bright autumnal day. I had taken unto myself a wife. I had 'olive-branches round about my table.' I had taken an active and leading part in the strife of politics, and the business of life. I had gradually become one of the last persons whom any one would think likely to be moved, even for a moment, by a superstitious fancy. I was known as a plain, matter-of-fact gentleman, troubled with few day-dreams, and holding a decided belief in the actual."

"One night, when absent from home on a visit to a friend, I retired to bed early, as was the custom in his well-regulated house, and lay in that pleasant, quiet state, which may be taken as the medium between thought and repose. Contemplation, which had been busy, was momentarily fading; but sleep had not yet put in his seal upon the phantasies. As the clock commenced striking the midnight hour, I heard—or thought I heard—the door of my chamber slowly opened, and footsteps—they seemed a woman's, by their light tread—pace stealthily along."

They came near—yet nearer. They reached the side of my bed, and paused. Then a dim light appeared through the curtains, as if some one were cautiously holding a lamp, half veiling its light, so as to allow a glance at my features, without dazzling me. The curtains slowly opened, and—and, by heaven!—for it was not a dream—I saw a woman's face, pale, melancholy, yet indistinct, gazing upon mine with intent and mournful aspect. Of the lineaments of that face, which yet appeared not wholly unknown to me—haunting me like the memory of something long since seen—I could gather little precisely in the brief and fleeting glance I had of them; for, as I have said, they were indistinct. But the eyes!—so lustrous, and yet so mournful in their brightness and expression—these I could distinctly see: these awakened memory within me, though I knew not what, or whence, or how was my knowledge of them.

"I started from my stillness. I spoke, to satisfy myself that I was not in sleep. I looked around, to see whether the light which had glanced upon me might not be that of the moon peering in through the casement; but it was a dark, starless night. I turned to the vision, if such it were; but as I was about addressing it, I saw it slowly vanish. I arose and followed it—in vain! As it retired, the light by which it was mantled grew less and less; but the unearthly lustre of those sorrowful eyes remained the latest in my view. Just as all had faded away, the clock pealed out its last stroke of midnight; and that clear sound fell on my ear like the knell for a departed soul. A shriek, too, more piercingly shrill and wildly horrible than any sound I had ever heard before, accompanied the exit of the shadowy visitant. All, from first to last, which I had seen and have described, had happened between the first and the last stroke of the midnight hour. An age of agony was concentrated into the compass of those few moments.

"When the morning came, breaking the troubled slumbers of the night, I found my door fastened within, precisely as I had secured it when I retired to rest. The circumstance appeared so startling, when I calmly considered it, that I made a memorandum that day, while each particular was vividly fresh in my mind, of what I had seen or imagined. Why should I longer delay the result? Within ten days I received a letter informing me that she who had long been separated from my very thoughts, had died in the foreign land where she had passed so many years. The startling coincidence was, that the breath of life had departed from her on the very day, and at the very hour, when those dark, unfathomable eyes met mine, as I have told you. She died suddenly, and by no lingering illness. I have no more to tell."

To wonder at this strange relation, and to repeat, with Hamlet, that there were more things in earth and heaven than our philosophy had dreamed of, was only natural. I ventured to inquire what the narrator really thought of the visit from the world of spirits—for it was clear that such he had conceived it to be—and the answer was: "I doubt not that it was her departing spirit, which, as it hovered between dust and immortality, thus gave its latest token of remembrance to him whom it had loved in life and until death—testifying, by that last farewell, the truth of that affection which the grave alone could terminate."

ILLUMINATION OF ST. PETER'S.—Instantaneously, universally, the vast building and the long colonnades leaped from that soft, shaded light into living flame. It seemed that the sacred fire had descended upon the cross, which first blazed forth, or that it had been lit by lightning. Great, glorious lights burst out of the darkness in a thousand unsuspected places—some pointing steadily towards heaven, some streaming like red banners on the wings of night. They swung between the pillars of the colonnades, they throbbed among distant shadows, they flashed on near columns and cornices, they made the globe look like a globe on fire. There was something so marvellously beautiful, so almost incredible, in the sight, that I was quite overwhelmed and bewildered, half questioning if it was not some splendid illusion of the senses, some gigantic fairy phantom, some wondrous unreality. It was a singular thing that, the farther we went from St. Peter's, after this, the larger it appeared, till it seemed to have grown into a great mountain of light. Seen from the Pincio, it was grand and beautiful beyond all imagination. We remained on this height till very late, and left reluctantly at last, thinking, with real sadness, that those glorious lights would burn away into the morning, and we never see them more.

CURIOUS CIRCUMSTANCE.—THE SWALLOW AND THE SPARROW.—Under the eaves of a house in St. Owen's Street, in this city, a swallow's nest of last year, in which a young family had been reared, remained for occupation (probably by the same birds) on their return to this country from their continental winter sojourn. During their temporary absence, the nest was taken possession of and inhabited by some house-sparrows, who, from their loud chirrupings, seem to have found it very snug quarters. The swallows, wishing to regain possession, had several skirmishes with the intruders, one of whom appeared always to remain at home, to offer resistance from the interior; but they were unable to dislodge them until one day lately, when it was observed that a swallow pertinaciously attached itself to the outside of the nest, where it was seen late at night, evidently keeping watch on the sparrow prisoner. The next morning, however, the sparrow had deserted his post; but from the entrance to the nest the dead sparrow was suspended by one of its feet, which was firmly cemented to the outside of the nest, and where it still remains, as an admonitory warning to all other burglarious sparrows.—Hereford Journal.

[THE ITALIAN VIOLIN PLAYERS.]

VIRGINIA AND CAROLINA FERNI.

YOUNG ITALIAN VIOLIN PLAYERS.

At the upper end of the Rue d'Enfer, amidst that still and noiseless district of Paris—so favourable to solitude and study—in an atelier rather humble externally, but rendered curious within, by the large collection of the most interesting specimens of ancient and modern art which it contains, resides the painter, M. Devers, who is a patron himself. A short time ago he invited his friends and a select party of musical celebrities, to hear the performance of two young sisters, already known for the remarkable talent they have acquired on the violin.

The Demoiselles Ferni belong to those rare feminine organisations who are endowed with sufficient energy and spirit to brave the countless difficulties of an instrument which, simple as it appears, lends itself to the widest range of combinations in melody; and which, in spite of the new and ever-changing effects found in its chords by the great violinists, from Tartini to Paganini, is destined, perhaps, to produce others still more extraordinary, according to the different faculties of the artists, who must not, and will not, be daunted by the laborious study of the violin, so fertile in powerful results.

These young ladies, Carolina and Virginia Ferni, were born at Côme, in Lombardy, of a very respectable but not a wealthy family of artists, and received their musical education at Turin. From their earliest infancy these wonderful girls had already given signs of a natural aptitude for music, by their singular and strenuous perseverance to encounter and overcome the hard trials of this instrument, and emulate the glorious examples of the illustrious artists who have led the way in the same career. Fortified with the advice of Allart, of Beriot, of Vieuxtemps, and of all the most famous violinists they have met in the course of their artistic peregrinations, the sisters Ferni have already contrived to acquire a talent of an uncommon order, which time will develop and mature, and which has already secured for them both the approbation and encouragement of the skilful musicians before whom they have performed.

Carolina, the younger of the two sisters, exhibits a power over the bow, and an execution with the fingers, of a most marvellous character; Virginia, on the other hand, is remarked for the great purity of sound and the elegance of her performance, in which there is equal taste and feeling. When they stand up together in the same morceau, these opposite qualities melt into each other, producing in their blended harmony a correct and masterly style, whose accuracy and method are astonishing, but do not exclude variety of effect.

If M. Devers intended, at his friendly party, to display the juvenile graces of his two compatriotes, as well as the sympathy of their musical execution—qualities which could hardly be appreciated in a public assembly, where they are lessened if not lost in the throng—his double object was obtained; for the Demoiselles Ferni, besides charming the audience by the candid playfulness of their disposition, proved themselves worthy, by their talents, to take their places among that glittering constellation of Italian violinists whose glory they are destined to increase.

CHINESE WOMEN.

THE wife and daughter of the Chinese farmer walk about the world with such feet as it has pleased God to give them—and very pretty feet and ankles they generally are. In fact, whatever want of beauty of feature there may be among the Chinese women, no one can deny them the merit of remarkably beautiful feet, ankles, hands, and arms. Of the rest of the figure one can judge but indifferently, from their peculiar though not ungraceful costumes.

In the country villages, the young girls and matrons may be seen at their doors, or grouped together beneath the trees, or in the yard attached to the house, engaged in household or farm occupation, laughing the while in merry chorus to their work. I have often, from the back of my horse, looked over the low walls at such a group, but the result was rarely complimentary; for on some coy damsel suddenly catching sight of my Saxon face, she would scream an alarm to the rest, who retreated to the house with a general screech. On reaching the threshold, however, they would generally stop to giggle at the object of their fears, on finding him not pursuing with savage intent; or sometimes the respectable, bearded patriarch would take them by the shoulders, and, in spite of their affected resistance, push them all out again into the yard, calling jokingly to me at the same time, in some incomprehensible gibberish, probably, "to eat them up." I flatter myself, however, that I was not sufficiently frightened to alarm them very much, with a stout wall between, and the whole village within call; far different, however, was the case when "the foreign devil" happened to come upon one solitary matron, pursuing her way from one villago or farm to the other. Her fears were really terrible, and she fled as fast as her legs could carry her; if, however, the unprotected female happened to be of the small-footed kind, she staggered off with the aid of her bamboo, till an unlucky trip would usually leave her sprawling on the path, or not impossibly into the mud and water of a paddy-field. To rush to her assistance was the natural impulse; but the approach of the monster was a signal for the most tremendous shrieking, and one could only perceive at the risk of throwing the distressed matron into hysterics. It was a disagreeable dilemma, but it invariably ended in my walking on and leaving the lady to scramble out of the mud in her own way. If I had a Chinese attendant with me, I usually sent him on to conduct any fair one I might meet into a secure bye-path, or to assure her of the harmlessness of my general character and habits.—Recollections of China.

FACETIE.

LOVE.—A little sighing, a little crying, a little dying, and a deal of lying.

SELECTED ANAGRAMS.—Lawyers—Sly Ware; Parliament—Partial men; Astronomers—Moonstarkers; Intrigue—I get ruin; Organs—Groans.

TAKING WINE.—Hook was once observed, during dinner, nodding like a Chinese mandarin in a tea-shop. On being asked the reason, he replied: "Why, when no one else asks me to take champagne, I take sherry with the épergne, and bow to the flowers."

A SALAD.—According to the Spanish proverb, our persons are wanted to make a good salad: a spendthrift for oil, a miser for vinegar, a councillor for salt, and a madman to stir all up.

I believe every created critter in the world thinks that he's the most entertainin' one on it, and that there's no gettin' on anyhow without him. Consait groovs as natural as the hair on one's head, but is longer in comin' out.—Sam Slick.

A STEAMER.—An American's description of a steamboat: It's got a saw-mill on one side, and a grist-mill on t'other, and a blacksmith's shop in the middle; and down cellar there's a tarnation great pot, boiling all the time.

HOW TO MAKE A DEBTOR OF A CREDITOR.—A Gascon meeting an acquaintance, asked him to lend him fifteen francs. "Fifteen! I have only ten in my pocket!"—"Oh, very well; give me the ten, and you can pay me the five at your convenience."

SELF-RICHES.—At an inn in Swenden, there was the following inscription, in English, on the wall: "You will find at Trollhathe excellent bread, meat, and wine, provided you bring them with you." And this will almost serve for a description of human life, so much depends upon the temper that events are met with, and on the prudence that foresees and provides against them.

WHY WIVES CAN MAKE NO WILLS.

MEN dying make their wills—why cannot wives? Because wives have their wills during their lives.

HAD Tully himself pronounced one of his orations with a blanket about his shoulders, more people would have laughed at his dress than have admired his eloquence.

"Do you really believe, Doctor Johnson," said a Lichfield lady, "in the dead walking after death?" "Madam," said Johnson, "I have no doubt on the subject; I have heard the 'Dead March in Saul!'" "You really believe, then, doctor, in ghosts?" "Madam," said Johnson, "I think appearances are in their favour!" The doctor was notoriously superstitious. The same lady once asked him if he ever felt any presentiment from seeing a winding-sheet in the candle? "Madam," said Johnson, "if a mould candle, it doubtless indicates death, and that somebody will go out like a snuff; but whether at Hampton Wick, or in Greece, must depend upon the graves!"

UNANIMITY.—A Scotch parson, in his prayer, said: "Laird bless the grand council, the parliament, and grant that they may hang together." A country fellow standing by, replied: "Yes, sir, with all my heart, and the sooner the better—and I am sure it is the prayer of all good people." "But, friends," said the parson, "I don't mean as that fellow does, but pray they may all hang together in accord and concord." "No matter what cord," replied the other, "so 'tis but a strong one!"

HOW TO BOARD AND LODGE IN AMERICA.—The Philadelphia Chronicle calls the hero of the following story a Yankee, but we will wager a sixpence that he was born in Pennsylvania. But no matter, it is a good joke: "What do you charge for board?" asked a tall, Green Mountain boy, as he walked up to the bar of a second-rate hotel in New York: "what do you ask a week for board and lodging?" "Five dollars." "Five dollars! that's too much; but I s'pose you'll allow for the times I am absent from dinner and supper?" "Certainly; thirty-seven and a half cents each." Here the conversation ended, and the Yankee took up his quarters for two weeks. During this time he lodged and breakfasted at the hotel, but did not take either dinner or supper, saying his business detained him in another portion of the town. At the expiration of the two weeks, he again walked up to the bar, and said: "S'pose we settle that account—I'm going a few minutes." The landlord handed him his bill: "Two weeks board at five dollars—ten dollars." "Here, stronger," said the Yankee, "this is wrong—you've made a mistake; you've not deducted the times I was absent from dinner and supper—14 days, two meals per day; 28 meals, at 37½ cents each—10 dollars 50 cents. If you've not got the fifty cents that's due to me, I'll take a drink and the balance in cigars."

RATTLESNAKES A DELICACY FOR THE TABLE.—A new addition has been made to the French cuisine—rattlesnakes. One of these charming reptiles, it appears, belonging to a travelling showman, died in Paris a short time ago from indigestion, caused by a tortoise which it had swallowed whole. An enterprising medical gentleman had a portion of it cooked, and he gave it to his dogs and cats. Finding that they sustained no ill effects, he tried it himself; and he declares that, with caper-sauce, it is as good as salmon, eel, or carp.

ON A MR. WINTER, A TAX-GATHERER.

There sits Mr. Winter, Collector of Taxes,
Whom everybody gives whatever he axes,
And though you may fancy what I say is all flummery,
Though Winter's his name, his proceedings are summary.

OUR FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF VICTORIA.—New sovereigns.—Diogenes.

A SENTENCE IN THE LANGUAGE OF FLOWERS.—If you wish for "Heart's ease," never look to "Marry gold."—Ibid.

IMPORTANT POLITICO-CULINARY-ORNITHOLOGICAL FACT.—We understand that Lord Malmesbury has announced his conviction that Turkey will not ultimately resist the demands of Russia: his lordship having been informed by his French cook that Turkey is not game.—Ibid.

An old maid who has invested all her money, says, facetiously, that she is one of the Vest-all Virgins.—Ibid.

DAMP SHEETS.—We see a newspaper advertised, called The Gas and Water Times. If this experiment succeeds, we believe it will shortly be followed by The Gin and Water Advertiser, The Soda Water Daily News, and The Milk and Water Chronicle.—Ibid.

A CONUNDRUM FOR ALDERMEN.—Why should turtles be pitted? Because theirs is a very hard case.—Ibid.

SIXPENNY GENT. I say, Cabby, if you don't make this animal go on, I shall get out! Cabby: Well, arn't I a trying to make 'im go? He never come none o' this nonsense afore the sixpence a mile business. Enough to spile the temper of hany 'oss!—Ibid.

NEW MATRIMONIAL TEST.—A paragraph is going the round of the papers, stating that a young lady—a believer in sympathy, magnetism, &c., &c., after hesitating between two aspirants for her hand, discovering that when one of her admirers joined her in the experiment, the table was moved ten minutes sooner than with the other, decided on accepting the hand of the former. The lady has made a fatal mistake. The gentleman's table-moving powers may be displayed under very unpleasant circumstances. Magnetic influences during courtship and after matrimony are widely different: they are in the relation of negative and positive. The lady will be shocked to see the facility with which her elect may move tables and chairs, and other domestic articles, under circumstances of excitement. She had better at once apply for a Faraday's detector, which, controlling the will of her spouse, may save her the unpleasant consequences of a domestic revolution.—Ibid.

QUERIES BY A QUEER ONE.

In giving a man the "cold shoulder," do you "cut" him when you "meet" him?

Has the "tide of events" anything to do with the "current of public opinion?"

Are "spirit-rappings" provided by "tap-stirs?"

Would triennial Parliaments benefit the people by keeping them on "short Commons?"

Does the "Master of the Rolls" sit in "Baker Street?" Won't it be necessary to consult the celebrated "Miles's Boy" as to when you've had a "sixpenny ride?"—Ibid.

LOVESUIT AND LAWSUIT.—Promise of marriage is like precious China—a man has so much to pay for its breakage.—Punch.

WELL OFF FOR SOAP.—In consequence of the reduction of the Soap Duties, an eccentric gentleman, who likes a smooth-shaven lawn, has the lawn in front of his house lathered in order to be shaved.—Ibid.

THE AMERICAN CUPID.—A young lady calls Mr. Hobbs Cupid, because Cupid is Love; and Love, as the proverb says, laughs at locksmiths, and so does Mr. Hobbs.—Ibid.

AN APPROPRIATE AMENDMENT.—Seeing how extremely difficult it is to get a complaint listened to at almost any post-office, we think the old simile, "As deaf as a Post," might very suitably be altered into "As deaf as a Post-Master."—Ibid.

THE BILL OF THE SESSION.—A more important bill than any which has been introduced into Parliament this session remains to be brought forward. That is, the Bill of National Expenses, including the baker's bill, which will have been incurred on account of the paper war with Russia.—Ibid.

"TIME WAS MADE FOR SLAVES."—The present policy of Nicholas is an illustration of the truth of this. For all he wants for Russians is time: a commodity that our cabinet seems disposed to allow any quantity of.—Ibid.

MOVEMENTS IN CELESTIAL HIGH LIFE.—We are informed, by our fashionable reporter, that a suite of apartments on the first floor have just been bespoken at Mivart's Hotel, for the Emperor of China.—Ibid.

THE DISSATISFIED CREATURES.—Calmen should not complain of being paid at the rate of sixpence a mile; for, look at some of our best panoramas—they only charge a shilling, and they are generally "three miles long."—Ibid.

A CABMAN'S IDEA OF A FARE.—A cheque on a Banker.—Punch.

MARKET AND TRADE REPORT.—City.—The deportation of such large numbers of shirt-hands, to which we have before alluded, has caused an unparalleled rise in wages, amounting, we are assured, in some cases, to as much as a farthing per dozen on "gents' dress." It is rumoured that the "United Distressed Needlewomen" contemplate striking for a reduction of the hours of labour. Twenty-one hours a day, with three intervals of two minutes each for meals, except during the busy season, which comprises only about eleven months in the year, is spoken of as likely to be their stipulation.—Ibid.

STRIKE OF THE WIVES OF ENGLAND.

At the present moment, when everything is rising, it behoves the Wives of England to be up and doing, too. There are thousands—perhaps millions of my oppressed sisters this minute married to husbands in the human form who, with a meanness which ought to make them ashamed of themselves, allow so much and no more for the expenses of the house. No matter what are the markets—the weekly allowance is the same. Bread may rise—butter may go up—legs of mutton may advance—and still no rise at home.

Therefore, it is desired that all wives suffering in silence under the yoke of the tyrant, will take the remedy in their own hands—and strike.

All ladies willing to co-operate—that the blow may be aimed through the cupboards at the husbands on the same day—are requested to communicate (post paid) with MRS. MARY ANNE HEN.—Ibid.

PEDESTRIANISM AT ST. STEPHEN'S.

MEMBERS of the House of Commons, being in the library, or elsewhere about the house, have to run for it in order to be present at divisions, and are sometimes too late. Lightness of heels, as well as of principle, appears to be a quality necessary to a representative of the British people. An election contest might be an actual foot-race. Why not? The candidate that is able to outrun his opponent is at least as fit and proper a man to represent a constituency, as he is who can outbribe him. However this may be, we expect soon to see some such arrangements as the following among the parliamentary notices:

Thomas Babington Macaulay will run Joseph Hume, or any other member, on the India question; or what not.

Frederick Lucas, the Scarlet Runner, will match himself with Phinn, the Bath Brick, to run any length upon the Nunneries' Bill; or as much further as the Pope chooses.

Colonel Sibthorpe will run any member of her Majesty's government (in which he has no confidence) at any time, on any question.

We shall also have Sir J. T. Tyrrell, the Farmer's Boy, challenging Lord John Russell, the Bedford Pet, to a trial of speed; the Attorney-General will be invited to a similar match by Sir F. Thesiger; Mr. Bright will be proposing to hop Lord Palmerston; and perhaps Mr. Benjamin Disraeli will want to jump Mr. Gladstone in a budget.—Ibid.

BRICKS.

The natural history of Bricks is interesting.

We are enabled to trace it without difficulty from very ancient periods, both with reference to its different structures, and with reference to building purposes.

It is pleasing to observe how the bitumen was first used, how it was moulded into form, and baked into hardness, by the heat of the Persian sun. We can trace it through many of its forms until we come to the great Roman Brick of nine inches long, three inches broad, and three inches thick. We now discover, with the satisfaction and pleasure of the antiquarian, how long these Bricks have endured; but, for many years, we were not aware of any application of the Brick, other than that of strength, stability, and support of edifices—edifices which, sometimes, might really raise the question: "To what extent the architect for Time meant to contend with Eternity?"

We think we are indebted to our Cambridge friends—it may be to our Harrow friends, we cannot tell—for the first moral or ethical application of the word Brick.

How common it has been of late years to say to a man, whose virtuous tendencies are of the first order: "My dear fellow, you are a Brick." It becomes, however, more emphatic in the usage of the third person. "Do you know Mr. So-and-So? Is he really a man I can trust? Is he a good fellow?" The answer, in one word, is: "He's a Brick." The answer is satisfactory, in all senses, to the propounder of the question—indeed, a more satisfactory reply cannot be uttered.

We have heard this kind of expression called slang—it really is not so. Gentlemen, take up your Platarch, turn to the Life of Agesilaus, and what do you read? You'll find, if you understand Greek—and if you don't, set about learning it immediately, for the purposes of history, as well as poetry and elevation of thought—that when the Ambassador from Epirus went to Agesilaus, to have a diplomatic chat with him, he said to him: "Where on earth are the walls of Sparta?" In other States of Greece the principal towns have walls—but where are yours, dear Agesilaus?" The Sir Stratford Canning, or Lord Cowley, from Epirus, was answered by that amiable monarch: "I'll to-morrow, at morning dawn, show you the walls of Sparta. Breakfast with me, old chap; some of the best black soup this Sparta can afford shall be put on the table; and I'll show you the walls."

They met; and Agesilaus had drawn out his Spartan army before him, and with exulting cheer and dignified mien, said to his friend from Epirus: "Look! these are the Walls of Sparta, Sir; and every particular man you see is a Brick." How classical becomes the phrase! how distinct from slang!

We do not say we have translated the great Plutarch literally, but we have translated him in spirit; and if that great man had been now living, and could have seen this, he would no doubt have been delighted, and grateful to us for our application of history to the correction of vulgarisms, and to the promotion of sound and sincere classical literature.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

"MUSIC," says Addison, "is the only sensual gratification which mankind may indulge in to excess, without injury to their moral or religious feelings."

SUFFER not your spirit to be subdued by misfortunes; but, on the contrary, steer right onward, with a courage greater than your fate seems to allow.

SILENCE is the safest course for any man to adopt who distrusts himself.

THOSE who attain any excellence, commonly spend life in one common pursuit; for excellence is not often gained upon easier terms.—Dr. Johnson.

THOSE who bestow too much application on trifling things, become generally incapable of great ones.—Roche-foucauld.

SERENITY of mind is nothing worth unless it has been earned. A man should be at once susceptible of passions, and able to subdue them.

DECEPTION.—Of all the agonies in life, that which is most poignant and harrowing—that which for the time annihilates reason, and leaves our whole organisation one lacerated, mangled heart—is the conviction that we have been deceived where we placed all the trust of love.—Bulwer.

VANITY is universal, and universally disowned.

In order to establish themselves in the world, men do all they can to appear established there. So Goldsmith declares: "If a man wishes to become rich, he must appear to be rich."

A man may be learned without talking sentences, as in his ordinary gesture he discovers he can dance, though he does not cut capers.

A person who is too nice an observer of the business of the crowd, like one who is too curious in observing the labour of bees, will often be stung for his curiosity.

TRUE policy says nothing—it does.

ROCHEFOUCAULD says, that "philosophy triumphs easily over past and future evils, but present evils triumph over philosophy."

We fancy we hate flattery, when all that we hate is the awkwardness of the flatterer.

A LADY OF DAMASCUS.

WE will first describe the daughter of the host—a very fair specimen of her sex in Damascus. Her eyes are beautifully dark, her eyelashes, eyebrows, and hair of a glossy, black: the latter, tinged with henna, hangs down her back, and reaches nearly to the ground, in a succession of plaits, each terminating with black silk braid knotted and interwoven with various sized golden coins; her features (excepting the eyes) are all small, but compact. The nose is Grecian, the lips cherry, and slightly pouting, the chin dimpled, the form of the face oval, and the complexion clear, with a rosy tint. The bust and figure are unexceptionable, the arms comely, the wrists and ankles well turned, and the feet and hands perfect models for a sculptor; yet this is one out of the many nondescript beings that we encountered with izar and veil in the street. Her face and figure are well set off by the head-dress and oriental costume. On the top of her head she wears a small red cap, which is encircled by a handsomely flowered handkerchief, and over the latter strings of pearls and pieces of small gold money are tastefully arranged in festoons. In the centre of her red cap is a diamond crescent, from which hangs a long golden cord with a blue silk tassel, usually ornamented with pearls; her vest fits tight, and admirably displays the unlaced figure. In summer this vest is of blue or pink satin, bordered and fringed with gold lace; in winter, cloth, edged with fur, is substituted for the satin; and over the vest is worn a short grey jacket, chastely embroidered with black silk braid. The vest is confined to the waist by a zunnar, in summer, of a silk Tripoli scarf—in winter, by a costly cashmere shawl; and from under this a long robe reaches to her ankles, and is divided into two long lapels, lined with satin and fringed with costly trimmings. This latter robe partially conceals the shirwal, or full trousers, which hang loosely over, and are fastened round the ankles; the tasty mixture of colours, and the graceful arrangement, renders the costume a perfect study. Latterly, European shoes have been much used by the Damascene ladies, especially those gaily-flowered kid shoes imported into Syria from Marseilles.

This completes the young lady's toilet, and her walk and action are as graceful as her figure and face are prepossessing; but beyond the naam (yes) and la (no) of conversation, you can seldom get a word from her unless you are a very intimate friend of the family; and then these young ladies are as fond of a little romping or quizzing as their more accomplished and more elegant sisters of the north. It is a mistake to imagine that the natives of the Turkish empire are wholly excluded from any friendly intercourse with the women of those countries—a tale which has gained credence and been perseveringly maintained by travellers, few of whom have ever had an opportunity of testing the truth of the report by personal experience.

Amongst the higher classes of the Greek, persuasion in particular, every freedom exists in doors; young ladies not only show themselves, but, after serving the guest with coffee and sweetmeats, they will seat themselves on the edge of the divan, and soon manage to join in the conversation. This state of freedom exists to a greater or less degree till the young girl is betrothed: then it is not considered decorous that she should be present whenever her intended bridegroom visits the house, neither should she hear his name mentioned. Even amongst Turks, and more especially in the villages and smaller towns of Syria, the young Mahomedan sees and converses with the future object of his love until she attains her eleventh or twelfth year: she is then excluded from the society of men; but womanhood has already begun to develop itself in the girl of ten or eleven years old in these climates, where they are often wives and mothers at thirteen. Hence, love exists between the young couple before the destined bridegroom urges his mother to make the requisite proposals of marriage. He loses sight of his lady-love as soon as she enters upon womanhood, though he may, by means of a third party, catch an occasional glimpse of her features as she passes to and fro, strictly guarded by matrons and old duennas; but not a single word or one bewitching kiss can the despairing lover hope for until she is brought home to his house, his lawful consort and partner for life: then, and not till then, commences the great seclusion of the ladies of the Turkish harem. Even this feeling, in country places and villages, though the newly-married bride may be strictly guarded for a year or two, eventually wears off, and the women mix in the every-day occupations of the field or in the garden, unveiled and undistinguishable from their Christian neighbours.—The Thistle and the Cedar of Lebanon.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AN AGED FRENCHWOMAN.—A female named Plet died some time since at Cambrai, aged 105. She never had recourse to medical assistance during the whole of her long life, except two days before her death. She died in the house in which she was born. She has left three sons, one of whom is 70 years old.

TELEGRAPHIC DISCOVERY.—The Cologne Gazette affirms that the telegraph director, Gintl, has discovered a means of making one telegraphic wire convey two messages in opposite directions at the same time.

DREAMING OF THE DEAF AND THE BLIND.—Dr. Darwin was of opinion that if a deaf person dreamed of hearing, the internal parts essential to the function were unimpaired. The same remark, it is said, is applicable to the blind. It is invariably found that the incurably deaf and blind never dream of hearing and seeing.

WALKING STICKS.—Walking-sticks were first introduced into fashion by the effeminate Henry II. of France, but did not become a requisite appendage to the gentleman of fashion in England till the year 1655, at which time they were formed with an indented head, in order to afford a more easy pressure of the hand which they supported. Ingenuity, which, in matters of fashion, is for ever on the alert, now crowned it with the addition of the round and hollow top, which sometimes contained nutmeg or ginger, to warm the stomach of the valetudinarian, and sometimes sugar-candy for the asthmatic; but snuff soon after coming into universal use among the bon ton of society, the cavity was exclusively appropriated to its reception; and the meeting of two friends was invariably marked, after the first salutation, by the unscrewing of the tops of their walking-sticks.

PROFESSIONS FOR WOMEN.—The profession of medicine seems to belong peculiarly to woman by nature: part of it exclusively. She is a nurse, and half a doctor, by nature. It is quite encouraging that medical schools are beginning to instruct women, and special schools get founded for the use of women; that sagacious men are beginning to employ women as their physicians. Great good is to be expected from that! As yet, I believe, no woman acts as a lawyer. But I see no reason why the profession of law might not be followed by women as well as by men. He must be rather an uncommon lawyer who thinks no feminine could compete with him. Most lawyers that I have known are rather mechanics at law, than attorneys or scholars at law; and in the mechanical part woman could do as well as man—could be as good a conveyancer—could follow precedents as carefully, and copy forms as nicely. And in the higher departments of legal work, they who have read the plea which Lady Alice Little made in England, when she could not speak by attorney, must remember there is some eloquence in woman's tongue, which courts find it rather hard to resist. I think her presence would mend the manners of the court—of the bench, not less than of the bar. In the business of theology, I could never see why a woman—if she wished—should not preach as well as a man. It would be hard, in the present condition of the pulpit, to say she had not intellect enough for that! I am glad to find, now and then, women-preachers, and rejoice at their success. A year ago I introduced to you the Rev. Miss Brown, educated at an orthodox theological seminary. You smiled at the name of "Reverend Miss!" She has since been invited to settle by several congregations of unblemished orthodoxy, and has passed on, looking further. It seems to me that woman, by her peculiar constitution, is better qualified to teach religion than any merely intellectual discipline. The Quakers have always recognised the natural right of a woman to perform the same ecclesiastical function as man. At this day, the most distinguished preacher of that denomination is a woman, who adorns her domestic calling as housekeeper, wife, and mother, with the same womanly dignity and sweetness which mark her public deportment.

CATCHING A BEAR.—The following is a description of an Esquimaux bear-trap: "A thick and strong piece of whalebone, about four inches broad and two feet long, is bent double. While in this state, some pieces of blubber are wrapped around it, and the contrivance placed in the open air, where a low temperature renders it hard and compact. It is now ready for use. The natives being armed with bows and arrows, and taking the frozen mass with them, depart in quest of their prey, and, as soon as the animal is seen, one of them deliberately discharges an arrow at it. The bear, feeling the insult, pursues the party, now in full retreat; but, meeting with the frozen blubber, dropped expressly for it, swallows the lump. The chase, the exercise of running, and the natural heat of the inside, soon cause the dissolution of the blubber; the whalebone, thus freed from incumbrance, springs back to its old position, and makes such havoc with his intestines, that the beast discontinues the chase, and soon dies."

A GOOD-HUMOURED BASHAW.—The possession of arbitrary power seems to degrade man to a level with the beast. Emperors and slave-drivers, who may have smiled the smile of angels on their mother's bosom, soon degenerate into ferocity, when the sceptre or the lash is put into their hands. Why should we wonder, then, that a bull-necked, low-browed Turk, invested with the koorbash and scimitar, and specially charged with the task of acting as a kind of chronic Verres to his province, should succeed in galling everlastingly the feelings of the people placed under him? I remember an instance of the extent to which a pasha, quite débonnaire in his dealings with most people, was led by a momentary impulse of avarice. There was in one of the provincial capitals a man, whose reputation for probity was established on long experience, and who was intrusted by merchants, ladies, and others, with jewels for sale, without receipt of any kind. This fact came to the ears of the governor—the amiable functionary I have alluded to—and as the jewel-dealer was passing beneath his window one day, he beckoned him in, and asked him what he had with him. It happened that he had only a few coral necklaces and a large pearl. This was not worth while. He was told to come next day, and in the mean time he went from house to house, amongst people whom he knew, gathering a good stock. Every one could prove the delivery of the jewels, and every one was sure of the honesty of the agent. He disappeared, however, and the report soon spread through the city that he had been murdered. Presently one, and then another person, and so on, came forward to say that he had been seen to enter the pasha's palace; and indeed his corpse was found on the banks of the river, a few yards below. Of the jewels, however, there was no news. Public opinion accused the pasha; and the European representatives took up the matter. Their interference was effectual in one respect—the murderer restored some of the jewels with a shrug; but there was no proper inquiry, and of course no punishment.—The Turks in Europe.

PROFESSIONAL JEALOUSY.

JEALOUSY is one of the meanest, but not the least powerful, of the unclean spirits that infest modern society. How rarely is it that we hear sincere, unqualified praise flowing from the lips of a rival! In order to beget hatred, it seems only necessary that two men should start on the same path. They may be friends at first; but in a very short while afterwards we are sure to find them foes: the success of the one being gall and wormwood to the other. Do you doubt this? Then look around you. Who are the most unmerciful critics of works of art? Artists. Who tomahawk incipient poets? Poetasters. Moot but a point on theology, and you straightway have reverend doctors abusing each other with a heartiness that would do credit to Billingsgate, and indicating in no disguised language the future destination of their compeers. Let a medical practitioner start a new theory, and his brethren are instantly down upon him. He is a quack—a rogue—an ass—an impostor. Even though the life of a patient be at stake, they scorn to hold consultation with one who is a disgrace to his order. Better that Mrs. Jones should die unaided, than that the noble faculty should be profaned.

Furnish a couple of rival tragedians with real Andrea Ferraras—let them fight it out in the last act of Macbeth; and to a moral certainty one of them will be pinked or hideously slashed. Did you ever know a reigning beauty who looked kindly on a young debutante? If such a spectacle was ever seen, you may be sure there was a mortal venom beneath the smile. Men say that the lawyers, as being constantly pitted against each other, are the least jealous of all professionals; but we have heard of such things as systematic snubbing from seniors.

Let no man charge us with inconsistency in these remarks. We expect not that professional competitors shall go about trumpeting each others' praises—that were, perhaps, a stretch of liberality beyond the power of human nature. But there is a wide difference between that and deliberately running down your rival. Why hate a man because he sells twice as many copies of his book as you do of yours? Has he injured you thereby? Not one whit. Has he depressed your genius? Clearly not. Even though he had never existed, you would not have achieved a greater success; then, why hate him? An early chapter of the Book of Genesis is suggestive of the reason. The first murder arose from hatred engendered by jealousy; and jealousy, at the present day, is as active and vigorous as ever.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AN ANXIOUS PARENT.—The birth of a child, two years of age, may be registered on payment of five shillings.

T. C.—A granddaughter can claim the share of the personal property her deceased parent would have been entitled to, if living.

LAYTON.—Rum is used to remove scurf from the skin. It is applied by means of flannel or sponge. Eau de Cologne is also used for the same purpose.

JOHN DOUGHER.—The best way to remove corns is to sew together about eight or nine pieces of flannel the size of a shilling, and then, cutting a round hole in the centre, place it on the corn so that the latter may grow out, and be wholly extirpated. All pressure on the affected part is thus prevented.

X. O. Z.—Steel mixtures, invaluable as tonics, may be prepared in a variety of ways. The following is one of them: Take of myrrh, finely pulverised, one drachm; subcarbonate of potash, twenty-five grains; sulphate of iron, one scruple; rose-water, eight ounces; white sugar, one drachm; spirit of nutmeg, half an ounce. Rub together the myrrh, subcarbonate of potash, and sugar, then add gradually the rose-water and spirit of nutmeg, and, lastly, the sulphate of iron.

HONESTAS.—Wait. Clandestine marriages rarely result in happiness. The parents of the lady suspect you. A proposal to them would remove every difficulty.

AN IRISH PRASANT writes an Irish letter. He is so temperate that he has plunged headlong into vulgar—very vulgar abuse. The weaker the cause the louder the voice, and the more ruffianly the gestures. Our readers, we are assured, will excuse our not following so bad an example; but we must tell him that, although not a "peasant," in the honourable sense of the word, he is extremely boorish—an unwashed hog in manners—and quite incapable of forming a correct opinion on any subject. He is wallowing in prejudice and darkness.

KATE.—The word Khan is of Tartar origin—it signifies lord or chief. The governors of the Persian provinces are called Khans.

FAIR PLAY.—We protested against some debtors not having the same measure of justice dealt out to them as felons. The latter cannot be committed to prison without a previous investigation before a magistrate; the former are unceremoniously lodged in gaol on ex parte statements, if the judgment went by default. That cannot be fair.

WILLIAM E.—The mode employed in blueing steel is merely to subject it to heat. The dark blue is produced at a temperature of 600 degrees, the full blue at 500 degrees, and the blue at 550 degrees.

C. M. S.—All bashfulness. The poor fellow will get over it in time; but you must not treat him haughtily, or he will get frightened, and run away. He is one of that class of lovers who approach near the precipice, but are afraid to look over it.

SARAH.—The best present a young lady could make to a young gentleman on his twenty-first birthday, would be a knitted purse, to give him the hint that, now he is about to make money, he must learn how to keep and make good use of it.

THOS. HAYS.—Lady Jane Grey was the eldest daughter of Mary, the younger sister of Henry VIII. Mary Queen of Scots was the descendant of Henry VIII's eldest sister, who married the King of Scotland.

LESLIE.—We publish your problem, as you so particularly wish it. Two gentlemen enter a room, and one of them, looking at a portrait, says:

Sisters and brothers I have none,
But that man's father is my father's son.

What is the relationship? or, in other words, whose portrait is it?

J. W.—There cannot be a question of the truth of the general principles of the science of phrenology. Those who contend for the contrary, are not gifted with an abundance of mental acumen.

J. WARR.—When the banns of marriage, owing to residence, are published in two different parishes, the marriage may be solemnised in either, but the officiating minister will require a certificate of the other publication.

M. R. A. B. C.—Marriages with a deceased wife's sister are prohibited by the English law—Act of Parliament law—but not the Canon law. Parliament, sooner or later, must remove the prohibition; but until it does so—which may be next session—you must respect your deceased wife's memory, her sister's honour, and your own self-respect and domestic peace, by refusing to inveigle her into an engagement which would be immoral as well as illegal.

ETHELINDA five years ago had a lover, and had every reason to think their love was mutual—but she listened to a person who spoke evil of him, and left the place where he resided, without leaving him the slightest clue to her whereabouts. She has since learnt what she heard of him was false: as she has now got a little fortune, she would like to marry; and as she does not think she could ever love another, she would like him to have the first choice. Could she with propriety write to him, explaining all the circumstances, and offering to renew the correspondence? Certainly, and with more than conventional propriety—for it would only be consistent with justice to make reparation. Our correspondent was wrong in listening to the voice of the slanderer—she was wrong in casting off her lover without a word of explanation; but we must say that she would make reparation in a generous and spirited manner.

O. E. M. prefers a request, which we regret we cannot comply with; but one portion of his letter is interesting to our ourselves, and we transfer it to our pages. He says: "Having read the LONDON JOURNAL in India, I feel I could shake hands with you as an old comrade—for if you only knew the many weary hours your Journal has dispelled, you could easily forgive my freedom. I do assure you the LONDON JOURNAL was eagerly looked for and devoured on the arrival of the Overland Mail." We lately received a letter from New Zealand, containing a similar statement.

LANCASTRIAN.—We cordially approve of the course you have pointed out for your self-advancement. The only difficulty would be in the judicious choice of a situation, and of the goods that would suit the neighbourhood. With your little stock, you are wiser than those who, with five or ten times the amount, are rushing to the antipodes. By the way, secure a piece of land on lease, and trust a good deal to frugality and industry, to make it profitable. A popular work on cottage gardening would be of great assistance to you.

MADELINE.—A gentleman (?) sent you the flower of the thorn-apple. What did he mean? He intended it either as a reproach or a rude insult. In the language of flowers, the thorn-apple means deceit. It languishes during the day, and avoids the sun. But on the approach of night the flowers revive, display their charms, and unfold their large bells—which nature has covered with purple, lined with ivory, and to which she has imparted an odour that attracts and intoxicates. It is a poisonous plant, and therefore dangerous to be allowed to grow where there are children. What flower shall you send him in return? A yellow pink, if you like—for that signifies disdain, contempt, scorn—on account of its being the least beautiful, the least fragrant of the pink tribe, and yet requires the most care. Or, if you wish to be very cross with him, you may send him a vine-leaf—for Anacharsis tells us that the vine-tree produces three kinds of fruit—toxication, debauchery, and repentance.

ZARA.—Single blessedness at twenty is double-distilled wretchedness at thirty. Be a sensible young woman, and marry, when you have the chance of marrying well.

 The wages of an apprentice belong to his parents. As they are bound in law to feed, clothe, and lodge him, the law gives them his earnings by way of compensation. Why grumble at such a wise provision? You signed yourself "One of your Readers." Don't do so again—for, had you not been a son contemplating an unfilial action, we should not even have acknowledged your letter.

J. C. M.—The wife of a transported felon cannot legally marry again, unless morally satisfied of her husband's death. Under the circumstances stated, the probabilities are all in favour of the man being dead.

CHAS. JACKSON.—Your wife has been enticed from her home by her mother, and you, in consequence, have been plunged into several pecuniary difficulties and great mental distress. The mother's conduct is unpardonable, and the wife, having received no provocation, must see that she has been led from the path of duty. A few weeks' reflection will, perhaps, open her eyes to her absurd and equivocal position, and then she will be glad to return home.

W. S. E.—The heart-cries of the unmarried ladies, old and young, is—

Why don't the men propose?

That very neglect causes more old bachelorism, old maidism, and other miseries, than most people even dream of. You love, are highly respectable, the lady seems impressed, the parents allow you to visit the house—and what is there to prevent your proposing at once? Select a cosy hour—one of those radiant hours in which the mother's cheeks bloom like roses—and endeavour to obtain her consent. That done, the father's follows, as a matter of course.

ARCTIC.—"The Lost Ship," of which you have sent us a copy, is far inferior to "The Castaway Ship," by the poet, John Malcolm. The three first verses, however, are highly descriptive.

Deep in the silent waters,
A thousand fathoms low,
A gallant ship lies perishing—
She foundered long ago.

There are pale sea-flowers wreathing
Around her port-holes now;
And spars and shining coral
Incrust her gallant prow.

Upon the old deck bleaching,
White bones unburied shine;
While in the deep hid hidden,
Are casks of ruby wine.

KATE ELLEN, with the sanction of her parents, has been receiving the attentions of a young gentleman about two years, and whom she had every reason to believe was sincerely attached. He now tells her he does not like her Christian name so well as many others he could mention. The man is demented. Why, Kate, next to Mary, is the most popular and best beloved name either in Europe or America. The poets have devoted on the name of Kate, Shakespeare often introduced it. Hotspur's wife was a Kate—"a gentle, loving Kate," and then there is Petruchio's Kate—"his 'super, super, dainty Kate'—his 'Kate of Calhall'—a true woman, from top to toe. Our Kate's lover, as the Persian proverb phrases it, had better submit his ears to the shears of discretion.

P. A. B.—Should you break off the engagement, you must expect to be dragged into a court of law. As you are so refined, and the girl so uneducated, why not endeavour to improve her? Women are more readily educated than the other sex. But if you are afraid that the girl is positively incurable, it would be better to submit to an honourable compromise, than to yoke to a wife whom you would fancy degraded you. But as you are so refined, you may have mistaken buoyancy of spirits and artless candour for vulgarity—so that the girl's feelings ought to be taken into consideration. In love, gathering flowers in haste and throwing them away at leisure, is not allowed.

MR. JAMES BRUTON has sent us a burlesque on a class of songs unfortunately very popular. Here it is.

THERE'S A SADNESS AT MY HEART, MOTHER.

There's a sadness at my heart, mother

A throbbing at my brow;

And little thought I, yesternight,

Of this affliction now!

To-morrow 'twill be so, mother

For many hearts now light,

But little reck of agony,

To reach them ere 'tis night

And yet my own rash hand, mother!

Hath wrought this heavy blow:

Yet do not curse thy erring child,

When thou the truth shalt know

Thy ear bend to my lips, mother!

Nor from me so recoil!

Know when I rose this morn I took

A dose of castor-oil!

C. J. T.—You could not be ordained a minister of the Established Church until you had attained your majority and obtained the degree of bachelor of arts.

JERSEY.—An old gentleman, aged nearly seventy, ten months ago buried the mother of his children, who was his second wife, and is now upon the point of marriage with a young lady about thirty years of age. At his former marriage, certain property was settled upon his late wife, he himself, in case of her death, retaining a life-interest in the same, with power to devise it by will entire to either of the children, or to divide it among them. This property he is about to settle on the young person who is about becoming his third spouse. Would the children be justified in seeking a remedy at law? As the property is personal, and therefore liable to be frittered away, they would be perfectly justified in taking such steps as would prevent their father being a knave as well as a fool.

E. T. J.—The origin of the beautiful substance, amber, has been, and continues to be, the theme of much discussion. Under the name of electrum, it was well known to the ancients—being so called from its possessing, in a high degree, with the aid of friction, the property of attracting towards it any light substances. It has as yet been obtained in the greatest quantities on the shores of the Baltic: on digging a few feet into the soil, or after a storm, it is found in large quantities, lying on the shore. We do not, however, hear of its being found inland, except at Fischenau, in Germany: the top stratum there is sand, underneath which lies a bed of clay; beneath that, again, there exist the remains of one of the antediluvian forests, in a state bordering upon coal, but still retaining the distinct marks of the woody fibre. This stratum is generally found to rest upon a bed of pyrites overlying a bed of sand, on which the amber is found in great abundance. Many of the ancient writers suppose it was derived from the same source as the resins and gums, to which they conceive it to be allied; but this story has been over-ruled, in favour of the more obvious one, that it is a species of pure bitumen, which, it has been admitted, is produced from vegetables which have decayed under peculiar circumstances.

BEIHAVEN.—We consider the whole to have been a delusion created by fear. The footstep was the echo of your own; the woman, some wandering lunatic; the light, the beams of the setting sun. The rest of the drama your own imagination filled up.

JOHN OWEN.—Another unfortunate instance of the results of clandestine courtships. The felicity of the lovers is about to be interrupted by the father bestowing the lady upon another. If the father will not change his purpose there is no help for it; but we must say, that disposing of girls just as if they were hardware, crockery, or bales of goods, is not very fatherly. Our correspondent must ingratiate himself with the mother—which he ought to have done in the first place; but let him try what virtue there is in "better late than never."

HERBERT L.—Disappointment in love never kills the wise. There are more daisies in the world than one. In your case, as the sentiment on the part of the girl is not decidedly strong, and there is a great disparity in your social positions, it would not be advisable to attempt to bias the parents in your favour. Improve your pecuniary resources, and convince the girl that if you can love well, you can also love wisely. Girls have a penchant for active and shrewd men of business.

MUSICAL A.—Refer us to what you deem the best modern songs, and we will give the list a liberal consideration. Our essayist treated of those that were popular; but as "Full many a gem of purest ray serene, &c." may be brought into the light, we shall only be too happy to facilitate the operation, if in our power.

J. WILSON.—The song of your friend "Will Wild," breathes a happier, a more hearty, and Scottish tone than the melodramatic emigration songs at present so popular in the country. The two first verses are the best. The last is slightly defective.

THE EMIGRANT'S FAREWELL.

Sweet home or my kindred, and land of my fathers,
It may be for ever I bid thee adieu:
Through night's dusky veil which around me now gathers,
The land of my birth fades away from my view.
Farewell to its glens, with its snow-covered mountains,
That lift their white crests to each bright rolling star;
And where the wild music of clear gushing fountains
Is borne on the wind through the valleys afar.

Farewell to the scenes where so oft I did wander,
With her, the bright star of my morning of love;
With deepest emotion my fond heart will ponder,
When afar from those scenes, an exile I rove;
Through the dark cloud of years, and o'er the wide ocean,
My thoughts will return to my loved native shore,
And oft in my dreams, with the fondest emotion,
I'll stray o'er the hills where I wandered of yore.

[MABEL ENTREATING THE MISER TO TAKE CHARGE OF THE OLD CHAIR AND THE BIRD AND CAGE.]

WOMAN AND HER MASTER.

CHAPTER VII.

He sleeps—but not the calm and sunny sleep
Which on the brow of peaceful childhood lies.

WHILST violence and crime were thus stealthily approaching his bed, the miser dreamed; and his dreams were a strange mixture of allegory and truth—a lesson and a moral—a glass which reflected alike the present and the past.

He saw himself a child, wandering in a beautiful garden, planted with perfumed flowers, and trees laden with fruit. He thought that he stretched forth his hands eagerly to grasp them, but at his touch they turned to gold—to bright, yellow, shining gold; and his eyes were dazzled at the sight. Like a madman, he kept piling heap on heap, till not a bud or fruit remained. When all were plucked, he sat joyously down, but the beauty of the garden had disappeared; the stems and boughs were broken, the leaves turned to ashes, and a sense of loneliness fell upon him.

His dream was a warning and a punishment: that garden was an image of the world; the flowers and fruit the joys, the holy ties, the tender sympathies which he had sacrificed at the shrine of avarice. He felt hungry, but the gold was tasteless. A sickness came over him—the ingots were scentless. In his dream he would have given them all for a single grape to moisten his parched lips—for one flower to revive his drooping senses.

In this state he saw a hideous-looking being appear to rob him of his treasure—of that treasure for which he had bartered so many pure delights, so much domestic bliss—the smile of love, and friendship's manly grasp. With a loud cry of terror and despair, he started from his pillow. His dream, in fact, was realised—for close by his side he perceived Ned Cantor, one hand grasping the murderous knife, the other holding back the curtain.

Although Nicholas Arden was well stricken in years, his frame was still active and vigorous. With a single bound he started from the opposite side of the bed, and stood at bay like a gaunt wolf.

"What would you?" he demanded.

"Only a little of that superfluous gold you carry about you!" replied the husband of Mabel, who, half fainting with terror, still kept crouching behind the old oak chair.

"Gold!" repeated the old man, nervously. "I have not a coin upon my person, save the ones I received in change from your wife, when I paid her for my lodging—ask her!"

Ned replied only by an incredulous smile—for he well knew that, to save a single maravedi, the speaker would have sworn the same thing upon the gospels, even though his garments had been quilted with the precious metal all the while.

"Make haste!" shouted his partner in crime, from the window, where he remained to watch; "it is getting late, and we must be miles distant before morning!"

"Dog!" exclaimed the miser, half mad with terror; "murder me you may—but, I repeat it, to rob me is not in your power! My gold is safe—quite safe—far beyond your reach!"

"We shall see!" said the ruffian, with a atrocious expression, at the same time cautiously advancing towards him.

Mabel could endure no more. To the astonishment both of her husband and Nicholas Arden, she rushed from her place of concealment, and, throwing herself between them, implored the former not to stain his hands in crime.

"If poor, Ned," she continued, "let us at least be honest! It is something to meet the world face to face—to fear no eye—tremble at no step! I'll work for you, toil like a slave, and never murmur again—only spare me the shame of knowing that the father of my child is a felon!"

For an instant the wretched man was staggered by the earnestness of his wife's appeal. The unhappy woman clung to him, embraced his knees, and, with streaming eyes fixed upon his face, kept whispering:

"For our child's sake, Ned—for our child's sake!"

"Too late!" said the ruffian, in a tone of desperation. "I must have money!"

"He has none, Ned—he has none!" exclaimed his wife;

"he has none!"

"Besides," continued her husband, "he has seen and recognised me! It's no use—I must be safe: dead men tell no tales!"

Despite his efforts, it was some time before the guilty man could disengage himself from the embrace of his wife, who clung to him with despairing affection. It was the struggle of virtue to save the object it had once loved from falling into the abyss of crime.

"Let me go!" he muttered, between his clenched teeth;

"let me go, I say!"

But Mabel only clung to him the more firmly.

Finding there were no other means of disengaging himself, Ned struck her a violent blow upon the temple. Severe as was the pain, it was not there the outraged woman felt it most—it was upon her heart. Her grasp gradually relaxed, and she sank sobbing at his feet.

A moment more, and the murderer would have reached his victim, despite the efforts of his wife.

"The gun—the chair!" she frantically exclaimed; "defend yourself, but for pity's sake do not fire till the last extremity!"

Nicholas Arden was not one of those who require a second hint, especially where their safety is concerned. He understood her meaning in an instant. Retreating behind the chair, he caught up Ned's gun, which Mabel had brought with her, and deliberately levelled it at the head of her husband.

"Another step," he said, "and I fire!"

Ned gave a whistle, and his companion sprang in at the window.

"It's no use!" he cried; "we are two, and you can only hit one!"

"And which will be that one?" demanded the miser, coolly. "Not you, Ned Cantor—at least, not willingly. You may have the courage to cut the throat of a sleeping man, but not to face death! You are a cur—from your very heart a cur—for you have raised your hand against a woman!"

The two ruffians appeared embarrassed, for the keen grey eye of the speaker was fixed immovably upon them, and his finger rested on the trigger of the gun, whose muzzle remained levelled at the head of the first of his assailants.

"Go!" continued the speaker; "for your wife's sake I permit you to depart. Try not my patience further!"

The baffled ruffians began to retreat slowly towards the window. All at once Ned, suddenly recollecting himself, exclaimed:

"What fools we are! it is not loaded!"

His comrade, who stood between him and the miser, emboldened by the assertion, sprang forwards. The next instant he received the discharge in his chest, and sank upon the floor of the chamber, with a deep groan.

Seeing that one of his assailants had fallen, the old man, without a moment's hesitation, rushed upon Ned, who had already got one of his legs out of the window: to avoid the blow from the butt-end of the gun, which the miser dealt him, he threw himself bodily out, and fell heavily upon the ground.

"God!" shrieked Mabel, who, pale with terror, had watched the whole proceeding, "he is killed!"

"Humph!" ejaculated Nicholas Arden, doubtfully; "no great loss either!"

"He was my husband!" added the unhappy woman.

"Doubtless, or he would not have beaten you!"

"The father of my child!" she added.

"Who will live to be hanged!" continued the miser, who had advanced to the window, and could plainly distinguish Ned limping over the heath. Is the door fastened below?" he added, sharply.

"Yes!"

"Have you more powder and shot?" he demanded.

"He will not return!" replied the wretched wife; "I shall see him no more! Husband and child both gone—both lost to me!"

And she continued to rock herself to and fro on the chair, in which she had seated herself, wringing her hands in silent anguish.

A faint moan from the wounded man attracted the attention of Nicholas Arden, who began carefully to examine the body. Convinced that the hurt was not mortal, he tore the sheet from his bed into long strips, and began carefully to tie the hands and feet of the young ruffian. Having provided against the possibility of resistance, he next attempted to bandage his wounds.

Let it not be imagined that he was prompted to this by humanity—he had no such weakness. The idea had suddenly struck him, that Ned and his accomplice were the two thieves for whose apprehension a large reward had been offered: and the old man never neglected an opportunity of turning an honest penny.

"There!" he exclaimed, with an air of satisfaction; "he will do now, till they take him to Chelmsford!"

[At the name of Chelmsford—the assize town of the county, where criminals were tried and executed—Black Will shuddered. The old man noticed it, and a cold, sarcastic smile played upon his thin lips.

The rest of the night was spent in painful watching. At daybreak, Nicholas Arden, after cautioning Mabel not to approach the prisoner, rose to keep his appointment with Lawyer Quirk and Sir Charles Briancourt, at the post-house.

"Heed not a word the knave may say to you!" said the miser; "there is a reward for him; and though I have taken him singly, and without the least assistance, you shall have something out of it. Yes—yes—I shall behave liberally to you! He will not remain here long," he added; "the instant I reach the post-house, I will send down those who will take charge of him."

Although this was uttered in a low tone, Black Will heard it distinctly; and he mentally vowed, if ever he escaped, that the speaker should pay dearly for attempting to consign him to gaol, bound like a sheep for the shambles. As for his wound, the ruffian felt assured that he should get over that. The gun, fortunately for him, had been charged only with small shot.

Mabel promised: harassed and broken-hearted as she was, she would have pledged herself to anything.

Still it was not without certain misgivings that Nicholas Arden left the house: so anxious did he feel about the reward—so fearful lest any one should step in and divide the claim with him.

For some time the wounded man and Mabel sat eyeing each other in silence. Will did not lack that peculiar species of cunning which serves the bad man instead of wisdom—the knave in lieu of honesty.

"This is a nice night's work!" he muttered.

The unhappy woman sighed deeply.

"For myself," continued the speaker, "I don't so much mind—I shall leave neither wife nor child to be disgraced by my death; but it's a very different case with Ned. It will be all over with him, if I am taken, poor fellow!"

"They will spare him, for my sake!" ejaculated Mabel.

"Of course they will spare him!" answered Black Will, ironically; "the law is so very merciful, and Nicholas Arden will be sure to recommend him to mercy, for attempting to rob and murder him! But who, I should like to know, will screen him on account of the pedlar who disappeared so suddenly, after sleeping at your house?"

"Wretch—you do not mean that!"

She could not complete the sentence. Horror and shame had nearly choked her.

"Indeed, but I do mean it!" continued the ruffian, with a chuckle; "Ned pledged the old man's watch at Burrow's, in the High Street. I wonder," he added, "if they were to dig by the old lime-kiln, whether they would find the body! Well, no matter—Ned and I have been faithful pals—I suppose we shall hang together!"

And to show his indifference at the prospect of such a fate, the wretch whistled the "Rogue's March," till the pain of his wound checked him.

"You would betray him?" said Mabel.

"Why not? He has deserted me! Why should I swing alone? No; since I am taken, it shall all out! Just as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb—that's my motto!"

The woman reflected for a few moments—weighed in her mind the numerous robberies that had lately been committed, and the probability that her husband had been connected with them. The result of her deliberations was fearfully against his innocence.

"What do you wish me to do?" she said, despairingly.

"Cut these infernal swaddling clothes—that's all!"

Mabel, without speaking a word, left the room. The few moments of absence were full of painful suspense to Black Will, who well knew that his life depended upon the resolution she had taken. Presently she returned, with a knife in her hand. The heart of the prisoner bounded with joy.

The next moment his limbs were free. He stood erect, and shook himself like a water-dog.

"Where will you fly to?" she inquired, with desperate calmness.

"Where I shall be safe!" replied Will, with a laugh; "where neither beak nor shark will be able to find me! Give me but one quarter of an hour's start, and I defy the fiend himself to catch me!"

"Heaven will know where to find you!" said the unhappy woman; "hide where you may, Will, its eye will be upon you!"

With a laugh of mingled bravado and triumph, he left the cottage, leaving its mistress overwhelmed by the bitter sense of degradation, misery, and shame.

Nothing could exceed the rage and indignation of Nicholas Arden, when he found, on his return from the post-house, with assistance to secure his prisoner, that Black Will had escaped. He loaded his preserver with fierce invectives, and tore his grey locks in the madness of his disappointed avarice.

"Fifty pounds!" he screamed; "fifty pounds reward, which I had honestly earned at the risk of my life! Gone—stolen from me! Pay me that!" he added; "pay me that—or you shall hang in his place!"

It was with the utmost difficulty that Bandy-legged Jem and the village constable succeeded in removing him from the Travellers' Rest. His last words, as they forced him from the door, were:

"Pay me—pay me!"

"God!" exclaimed the wretched Mabel, as she closed the door after her unwelcome visitors; "is this my dream of life?" Tears came to her relief, and she wept bitterly.

CHAPTER VIII.

Crime's ready tool; from choice a knave—not want.

OLD PLAY.

FEW men were more vindictive in their natures than Lawyer Quirk and his worthless client, Sir Charles Briancourt. Both bitterly resented the conduct of Mabel at the inquest, and eagerly seized the opportunity of reaching the wife through her guilty husband—for whose apprehension a large reward was offered, as well as that of his confederate, Black Will. As for Mabel herself, she was permitted to remain undisturbed in her cottage for the present: the legal notice had not yet expired—it wanted a few days to the time when the baronet would be enabled to turn her adrift upon the world, to starve, beg, or steal—he cared not which; though, if he had a choice, most probably he would have preferred the latter.

Few things escaped the notice of Mr. Quirk, whose long intercourse with the most worthless portion of humanity had given him a certain tact, not only in detecting, but in tracing out the motives of others. He had long been anxious—exceedingly anxious—that the marriage of his daughter with Sir Charles should be acknowledged; but the awe in which both he and his son-in-law stood of the Dowager Lady Briancourt, had hitherto prevented any steps being taken towards the accomplishment of his wishes—she had so much in her power.

The influence which Barnes possessed over his haughty mistress had given him food for cogitation. The lawyer reflected—surmised—supposed—cogitated—and then reflected again. There was a secret—he felt convinced of that—but the nature of that secret baffled even his ingenuity to discover. To have sounded the old house steward would have been at once to put him on his guard—he therefore wisely forbore; but he quietly made his observations—gossiping first with one servant, then with another. It was a general remark throughout the household, that they had never known Mr. Quirk so condescending and agreeable before.

Things were in this state, when news was brought, late one evening, to the hall, that Ned Cantor had been taken. The eyes of Sir Charles sparkled with satisfaction—his adviser merely smiled. One thought of the gratification of his revenge—the other of the use he could make of him.

The baronet being the nearest magistrate, the prisoner was brought before him for examination.

"Leave the affair in my hands," whispered the lawyer, as they descended to the library, for the purpose of committing Ned to the gaol at Chelmsford. "Have you any strong place where you can keep him securely for the night?"

"But why keep him?"

"I have no time now to explain that," replied the man of law; "are not our interests one? Surely you can trust to me! Enough, that by this fellow's means I can find the way to extricate ourselves from the embarrassing position we are placed in with your mother."

Sir Charles looked surprised, but said nothing.

On entering the library, they found the prisoner, handcuffed, in the custody of the village constable and Bandy-legged Jem, by whose joint exertions he had been taken. There had evidently been a severe struggle between them—for Ned's clothes were torn, and there was a fearful bruise upon his forehead, from a blow he had received from the staff of the officer. He looked doggedly—nay, even insolently—round him, well knowing what sort of favour to expect at the hands he had fallen into.

The constable and Bandy-legged Jem began by stating that, after a desperate resistance, they had secured their prisoner, whom they encountered near the old lime-kiln on the heath, and, after reading the hand-bill offering a reward for his apprehension, requested Sir Charles to sign his committal to Chelmsford.

The baronet looked at Mr. Quirk—leaving the initiative of the affair to him.

"Sir Charles cannot do that!" said the lawyer, coolly. "He must first have the deposition of Nicholas Arden."

"At least his honour can remand him," suggested the constable: a proceeding which would have been equally inconvenient.

"Certainly," answered the man of law, "the magistrate can remand him—there is no doubt of that! In fact, it is his bounden duty, under some circumstances, to do so. But, in the present instance, would it not be advisable to send for the prosecutor to appear here in the morning?"

"But there are other charges!" observed the postilion.

"Which may be gone into at the same time," readily answered Quirk. "If I may advise, Sir Charles," he added, addressing his client, "the best thing you can do, will be to detain this man in the strong room at the hall till to-morrow. There is no possibility of his escape—and when Mr. Arden appears, the affair can be fully examined."

Neither Jem nor the constable approved of what appeared to them an unnecessary delay; but what could they object—both ignorant men, and poor? It was accordingly arranged as the speaker suggested. The officer was dispatched to Colchester, to summon Mr. Arden to appear at ten o'clock the following day; and Jem was dismissed to the post-house, after having first seen Ned duly consigned to the muniment or strong room of Briancourt Manor: which said room, being built entirely of granite, without window of any kind, and the door of iron, presented little chance of escape.

Still Jem did not feel satisfied; and after they left the house, it was agreed between them that Bandy-legged Jem should remain in the grounds and watch the mansion, to guard against foul play, whilst his companion proceeded on his errand to Colchester.

"Really," observed the baronet to his father-in-law, after they had retired to their wine in the drawing-room, "I cannot comprehend——"

"It is not necessary that you should!" said the lawyer, interrupting him. "I know your anxiety to punish this fellow. Very natural! But it is better to use him first and punish him afterwards."

"Use him?"

"Ay—make an instrument of him."

"But to what end—to what purpose?" demanded Sir Charles Briancourt.

Quirk filled a glass with wine, and nodded knowingly.

"Do speak plainly!"

"Plainly, then—to obtain not only your mother's forgiveness, but approbation of your marriage with my daughter."

"You do not know her!" said his client, with a sigh.

"She would sooner see me in my coffin!"

"Very likely!"

"She will look upon such an alliance with horror."

"Very probably!" answered Mr. Quirk, not at all pleased with the complimentary speech of his son-in-law; "but she shall consent to it, for all that! Nay, more—content herself with her marriage settlement, and forego all further control over the estates."

"And you will accomplish this by means of Ned Cantor?" exclaimed the baronet.

"Even so; but ask me no more questions. I am a man of action rather than words: you know what I have already achieved, and may surely trust to me for the rest!"

By this time it was midnight, and the household had already retired to rest—so the two worthies separated: the baronet to his own room, and the lawyer, as he said, to his.

As he left the drawing-room, he did not forget to take the key of Ned Cantor's prison with him.

The muniment or strong room of Briancourt Manor was situated in the northern wing of the building, which was comparatively uninhabited—for the apartments were gloomy, small, and inconvenient. This wing was the only remaining portion of a more ancient mansion, which had been partially battered down by the cannon of Fairfax, during the civil wars; the rest was modern, having been erected by the grandfather of the present baronet.

Although the prisoner had been left several hours to himself, he had not once closed his eyes, but, like a wolf caught in a trap, remained wakeful, and listening to every sound. The conduct of the lawyer had puzzled him, and he felt that vague kind of hope which sometimes sustains the criminal to the last moment. Something, he felt assured, would turn up, and his spirits rose accordingly.

The hall clock had struck the hour of two, when he heard a footstep cautiously approaching the door of his prison. The eagerness, the suspense of the ruffian became so intense, that he scarcely breathed; it stopped; the next instant he heard the ponderous key turn in the wards of the lock.

"All right!" he murmured, as he sank back, and pretended to sleep upon the straw which had been hastily thrown into one corner of the room, to serve him for a bed.

Presently some one touched him with his foot. He looked up, and, despite the pains which he had taken to disguise himself, recognised Mr. Quirk.

"Is it daylight?" said the prisoner.

"If it were," replied the visitor, "my presence here would be useless. Listen to me: I know that your sleep was a feigned one; men with halers round their necks seldom sleep!"

Ned clenched his teeth and groaned.

"What would you do, to stand free upon London Heath, with fifty pounds in your pocket, and three hours' start of your pursuers?"

"Anything!" replied the ruffian, his eyes sparkling with feverish joy at the hope held out to him; "risk my life—my soul!"

"Pooh—pooh!" interrupted the lawyer, with a quiet chuckle; "what should I do with your soul? If you have such a thing, it is mortgaged far beyond its value."

already! The service I require depends upon bone, muscle, nerve, and sinew."

"Ah! you do require a service, then?" observed Ned Cantor. "I thought as much!"

"Else why should I propose fifty pounds and your liberty to you?" was the reply.

"True—very true!" said the prisoner. "Well, sir, the service?"

"Are you acquainted with Barnes, the house-steward?" inquired his visitor, lowering his voice to a whisper.

"Yes! Must I murder him?"

"Murder! Ridiculous! Do you suppose that a man of my respectability would suggest such a thing?" replied Mr. Quirk, in a tone by which he intended to convey an idea that his probity and humanity were much shocked. "No; all I want you to do is to contrive some means of procuring me a small box which he keeps in the cabinet at the side of his bed."

"What does it contain?"

"Papers."

"And how am I to obtain it?" demanded Ned, doggedly.

"That is your affair," answered the conscientious lawyer; "he sleeps in the little pavilion at the end of this wing of the hall."

"Should he awake?"

"Your affair again!" observed the tempter. "All I can do is to lead you to the door: of course you would never be so unprincipled as to offer violence, or so indiscreet as to let me know it, if you did! Should you succeed, the fifty pounds and liberty are yours."

"And should I fail?"

"In that case," said his visitor, "I should first blow out your brains, and then alarm the house, stating that I had surprised you in an attempt to escape!"

The coolness with which the respectable, rich villain uttered this fearful threat, completely subdued the poor, disreputable one—who replied, that he would not fail.

"I am sure you will not!" observed the lawyer, with a smile; "a man's energy seldom flags when every step he takes lessens the distance between the gibbet and himself."

Mr. Quirk drew from his pocket a pair of exquisitely-mounted pistols, carefully convinced himself that the charges were all right, and deliberately examined the triggers and caps. This was done, not so much for his own satisfaction, as to impress upon Ned the folly of attempting to escape.

"Are you ready?" he said.

"Quite ready!" submissively answered the ruffian.

"Remember it is the box in the cabinet, on the right-hand side of the bed," whispered the old man; "you cannot mistake it: there are two seals upon the lid. Bring it me, and not only your liberty, but the fifty guineas I promised you, are yours."

"I'll bring it!" muttered Ned, with dogged resolution, between his teeth; "but should the old fellow awake—"

"I have nothing to do with that!" interrupted the tempter. "It is not for me to suggest anything; of course not! All I require is the box: you know the price I set upon it! This way!"

Taking up the lamp, which had been left burning in the strong room, the speaker motioned to the prisoner to precede him, indicating the turns he was to take by a motion of his finger—for they were drawing too near the pavilion in which the house-steward slept, to venture to speak. At the end of a long, vaulted corridor, they perceived a door. It opened into the chamber of Mr. Barnes.

Ned Cantor turned, and looked inquiringly towards the lawyer, who nodded in the affirmative. They had reached the spot.

In the centre of the door was a single pane of glass, with a green silk curtain—by drawing which, the inmate of the room could watch the approach of visitors. The ruffian, after a few moments' reflection, made signs to Quirk that he required some implement or means to cut the glass.

"The idiot!" mentally exclaimed the lawyer; "he will never be able to creep through that narrow space!"

Ned repeated his signs, intimating that it was not for the purpose of creeping through that he wanted to remove the pane, but to introduce his arm, and unlock the door from the inside.

"Not such a fool as I thought!" added Quirk, as soon as he fully comprehended the intention; at the same time he drew from his finger a valuable diamond ring, and placed it in the hand of his accomplice.

In a few moments he heard a low, scratching sound—it was the diamond cutting the window; the next difficulty was to prevent the pieces falling on the floor on the inside, and so startling the sleeper. But the wit of the thief was equal to the emergency: applying his lips close to the glass, he drew his breath, thereby producing the same effect as a sucker: after several attempts, which required great nicety, he at last succeeded in detaching that portion of the pane which had been cut on the outside, and caught it in his hands as it fell—a feat which he accomplished with such dexterity, that the man of law, who stood silently looking on, was struck with admiration.

"Clever fellow!" he murmured—"Clever fellow! Fifty such talents should be thrown away!"

Ned introduced his arm, and cautiously opened the door: so plain had been his instructions, that he easily found the cabinet and the box, which he recognised in the dark, by the seals upon the lid: in a few moments he returned, bearing it with him.

No sooner was Quirk convinced of his success, than he cautiously retreated along the passage, leaving his accomplice to follow him: they soon reached the little breakfast-room: once inside, the lawyer locked the door.

"So," he said, "you have won your liberty!"

"And the fifty guineas!" added Ned.

"Doubtless!" replied the old man, after examining the seals. "Now, tell me," he continued, "and frankly, how do you intend to dispose of the money and yourself?"

"Make the best of my way to London."

"Good!"

"From thence I shall sail to America."

"Better!"

"And lead an honest life."

"Humbug!" ejaculated the lawyer; "it is not in you, Ned! Honesty, in your position, implies labour—which you have an instinctive aversion to—perseverance, endurance, courage—I mean moral courage: three qualities foreign to your nature! Listen to me," he continued; "in the park you will find one of Sir Charles's hunters—take it, and ride as if you were riding a race with death: once in the metropolis, I will provide for your safety!"

"You?"

"I!"

Ned Cantor looked at him doubtfully—hesitating whether or not he might trust him.

"I have a use for you!" added Mr. Quirk.

The doubt vanished; he felt assured he could: the respectable villain required the services of the poor one.

The tempter opened his pocket-book, and hastily wrote a few words in pencil upon one of the leaves, which he tore out and directed—"Mr. Snape, Serjeants' Inn:" it was the name of his confidential clerk.

"Find the person to whom this is addressed," continued the old man; "give him the note, and leave the rest to his care: he will provide you with a retreat where the strong arm of the law—and it is very strong, Ned—will fail to reach you! I will smooth over your little affair with Mr. Arden," he added; "in three days you shall see me."

"And what am I to do for this kindness?" demanded the astonished felon.

"All in good time, Ned—all in good time! Nothing wrong, of course!" answered the lawyer, with a chuckle.

"Of course not!" replied Ned Cantor; "you would not be the man to propose such a thing—certainly not!"

And the two men, so worthy of each other, smiled and jested at the prospect of their future villany.

Mr. Quirk, who was a person of business, felt that it was time for his agent and himself to part: carefully unbarring the shutters, he opened the sash with as little noise as possible.

"There lies your road!" he whispered, at the same time placing the promised reward in his hands; "remember, in three days!"

"In three days!" replied Ned; "I'll not fail you!"

So saying he disappeared, and his confederate, after closing the shutters, returned to his own room, carrying the box with him.

"How stupid!" he exclaimed, as he broke the seal, and sat down to examine the contents; "I forgot to ask Ned to return my ring!"

Great was the consternation on the following morning, when the flight of the prisoner and the robbery of the house-steward's room was discovered. The servants looked upon each other with suspicion—each doubted his fellow.

That Ned Cantor must have had an accomplice was evident to all—for the keys of the muniment-room were found in the lock on the outside of the door.

When the groom informed Sir Charles Briancourt of the disappearance of the horse, the baronet affected to be very angry, and spoke of offering a hundred guineas reward for the apprehension of the thief; but his anger gradually subsided.

Even Nicholas Arden, the miser, was pacified, after an interview with Mr. Quirk, and took no further steps in prosecuting Ned: in fact, every one appeared content, except Barnes and Bandy-legged Jem. The former, although he said but little, was evidently deeply chagrined at the loss of his box; and the latter clamoured for the reward of which he had been deprived.

"No matter!" the sturdy old man would mutter; "they haven't altogether deceived me: I shall have him yet! Thof I be a lawyer, nor a barrowite, I know a thing or two! We shall see!"

Those who heard the disappointed postillion vent his spleen in these and similar obscure threats, paid but little attention to what they considered his ravings.

"As if such respectable persons as Lawyer Quirk, or Sir Charles," they observed, one to another, "could have anything to do with a low ruffian like Ned Cantor! Ridiculous!"

And so the matter dropped.

Three days afterwards, Mr. Quirk left Briancourt Hall for London, promising his son-in-law that he would return within a week—when, he assured him, everything thing would be made pleasant with his mother, touching his long-concealed lawsuit.

Probably the baronet was not so sanguine as his lawyer—for he listened to his promise in moody silence.

CHAPTER IX.

The cold, wide world before me—heaven my guide—
Conscience my only prop.

ALTHOUGH Mabel had long since ceased to love her husband—for love, in a pure and gentle nature, cannot exist when once respect has faded—still her woman's heart rejoiced at the news of his escape. She was once more alone in the world—alone, in the completest sense of the word—heart-broken and desolate. The Travellers' Rest had obtained an evil name, and her former customers entirely deserted her. After much consideration, she resolved to sell the furniture of her little cottage, honestly pay the quarter's rent, and quit the place, in search of the two children—her darling Meg, and the orphan of her former mistress.

"God will guide me!" murmured the poor creature "and the dead watch over me! I am sure I shall succeed!"

Her design was easily put into execution. When trinkets, clothes—everything, save the old oak chair and Meg's goldfinch, had been disposed of, and her debts paid, Mabel found herself possessed of exactly three pounds ten shillings—no great sum to cast herself upon the world with; but her maternal heart was strong in its love for her lost child—strong in its trusting hopefulness.

"Holloa, missus!" shouted a well-known voice, as the late landlady of the Travellers' Rest slowly walked down the High Street of Colchester, with the bird-cage in her hand, and the heavy oaken chair upon her aching head. "Where are you a-goin' to?"

She turned and recognised the old postilion, Bandy-legged Jem.

"To Mr. Arden's!" she replied.

"He'll lend anything on them articles!" observed the man, in a tone of commiseration—for he was not a bad-hearted fellow in the main. "Besides, the bird would eat—and nothing that requires food was ever welcome within his doors!"

"Perhaps you are not aware that I saved his life?" answered Mabel, colouring deeply as she uttered the words.

"No, I ain't!"

"And he promised to do something for me!"

"So he will!" said the postilion, with a broad grin "pray for you; or, as a very great favour, ask you to rest yourself after your walk; but he will neither ask you to break bread nor moisten your lips at his expense! He would never forgive himself such a piece of extravagance!"

Poor Mabel looked very downcast.

"That chair appears monstrous heavy!" added Jem. "I should like for once to get a peep at the inside of the old miser's den: so, if you like, I'll carry it for you!"

The offer was gratefully accepted; and away they both trudged towards the house of Nicholas Arden—the old man with the chair, and the woman carrying the bird and cage in her hand. She might have sold them for half-a-crown—a serious sum in her circumstances; but her heart would not let her. As we said before, they had been her daughter Meg's.

Although it was a bitter cold day, and the snow was falling thickly upon the ground, there was no fire in the room in which the miser's daughter and the boy Goliath were both seated. The truth was, they dared not light one, even if they had had the means—so bitter were Nicholas Arden's remonstrances against such extravagance. Alice was busily occupied in mending an old cloth cloak, in which she sometimes ventured to the neighbouring church. The boy sat upon a stool opposite to her, watching with melancholy earnestness the quick motion of her hand.

As we have previously described his young mistress, it will be only fitting to add a sketch of her companion.

Goliath Obie was about thirteen, and not ill-grown for his age. Left an orphan whilst yet in swaddling-clothes, he had passed the first eight years of his life in the poor-house, from which pleasant place he had been transferred to the parish school, where the master employed him, during play-hours, in cleaning boots, sweeping out the school-room, and running of errands. For two years the poor boy endured this species of slavery, disguised under the name of schooling. True, his education was not altogether neglected—for, being a quick-witted lad, he not only learned to read and write, but the first four rules of arithmetic—which, together with his knowledge of the Catechism, made him regarded, in some sort, as the model scholar of the establishment: a distinction far more annoying than profitable—Mr. Satchel, the master, caning him rather more than less on that account.

When any of the parish authorities called to visit the school, Goliath was sure to be called up and examined. It might have made angels weep to hear the poor little trembling wretch declare, in answer to the question of what his godfathers and godmothers had taught him:

"To be content with that state of life to which it has pleased God to call me."

Content! as if that all-wise and beneficent Being, whose very essence is love, had ever ordained that infancy should be subjected to the kickings, cuffs, and cruelties of a parish schoolmaster.

At the age of twelve, the poor boy had been put out to service by the guardians to Mr. Nicholas Arden, who was to pay two pounds a year, clothe and feed him. The money really was paid—the authorities took care of that—for it went to liquidate a portion of the expenses they had incurred on his account. At least, it was presumed to do so; but, as for the feeding and clothing, the former was worse than the fare in the workhouse; and a respectable scarecrow would have felt itself insulted by a proposal to change garments with Goliath Obie.

"It's very cold, Miss Alice!" said the boy, in a humble tone. "Don't you think so?"

"It is cold!" replied his young mistress; "but we will have a fire as soon as my father leaves home—I know he has an appointment at four; and, Goliath, I have a treat for you!"

"Any dinner?" demanded the lad, eagerly.

"Yes," answered Alice, with a faint smile—"an egg! I found it this morning in the coach-house! One of Squire Miller's fowls flew over, and laid it!"

"I do wish it had been an ostrich's!" exclaimed the poor fellow, with a ravenous look. "Squire Miller's fowls are nothing but bantams! What are you a-goin' to have?" he added.

"Nothing, Goliah! I am not hungry!"

"Not hungry!" repeated the boy, with a look of most unfeigned astonishment. "Well that is odd! I'm always hungry—master says it's because I'm a-growing—I wish I had done growing! He never eats—lives on air, I suppose, or the chink of his money! What a heap of bread all his gold would buy—wouldn't it, Miss Alice?"

As if overcome with the magnitude of the idea, Goliah ceased speaking, and sank into a deep reverie, from which he was awakened by a loud ringing of the gate-bell.

"I'll go!" said his mistress, rising from her seat: "do not disturb yourself!"

"An egg!" muttered the boy to himself, as soon as he was alone; "well, it is something! I wonder how a chicken would eat?" he added, with a ferocious expression. "Lord—Lord! how happy some people are! Squire Miller's boy boasts that he has dinner both in the parlour and kitchen every day! Every day!" he slowly repeated; "no—I can't believe that; and yet he looks quite fat enough for it to be true!"

Alice soon returned, followed by Mabel and Bandy-legged Jem, carrying the chair.

"Why won't it the butcher?" grumbled Goliah to himself; "but he never comes here—forgotten the way, I suppose!"

"Sit down," said Alice, in a gentle tone of voice—for Mabel had explained her errand. "I will inform my father you are here. I am sure he will see you, and grant your request. I am sorry—very sorry," she added, with a deep blush, "that I have nothing in the house to offer you; but my father dines out, and Goliah and I, we make shift with anything!"

"Nothing, you mean, miss!" muttered the boy.

The poor girl would not hear him, but instantly left the room.

"Well," said the postilion, "this is a queer place to live in!"

"Nobody does live in it!" observed Goliah, bitterly; "they starve in it!"

"No fire!" continued Jem, pursuing his commentaries.

"What's the use of fire when there's nothing to cook?" said the boy. "Master don't eat—Miss Alice don't eat—and when I complain of being hungry, they tell me it's nothing but growing pains! All I know is, that they grow worse and worse every day! Grumble—grumble," he added, rubbing his hand over his empty stomach; "I only wish you could feel 'em!"

Bandy-legged Jem looked as if he had not the slightest inclination to feel 'em; and Mabel, with her usual kindness, drew from her pocket a slice of bread-and-meat which she had brought with her, and offered it to the speaker.

Goliah did not require much pressing—but clutched it, like a hungry vulture, in his claw: it disappeared in an instant.

Nicholas Arden was busy, as usual, with his books, when his daughter entered the room to announce the visit of Mabel.

"And what does she want?" he demanded, in a harsh tone; "money—money, I suppose? Well, tell her she may keep the sixpence I paid her the night I stayed at her house for my bed, and did not use it—it is all I can afford!"

"She does not come for money, father," mildly answered Alice; "all she asks is, that you should take charge of—"

"Take charge!" interrupted the miser, eagerly; "has she any gold, or silver—of course I'll take charge of it—it is my duty as a Christian to do so! It will be quite safe with me!"

"Of a curious old chair," continued his daughter; "which her former mistress gave her—and a singing-bird!"

"A singing-bird!" repeated the old man, sharply; "I'll have no birds here, to eat me out of house and home! As for the chair, well and good—she may leave that—but no bird—no bird!"

"It will not cost much—merely a few crumbs!" urged the petitioner.

"Crumbs!" exclaimed the miser; "no business to have any crumbs! No—no—I say no!"

"Father!" said the poor girl, in a saddened tone—for she was grieved at the display of his ingratitude and avarice—"Mabel saved your life—you must not—shall not refuse her!"

"Shall not?" repeated Nicholas Arden, eyeing her with a frown.

"Shall not!" repeated Alice, firmly; "you forget that I am of age, and the right I have to speak!"

At the allusion to her being of age, the countenance of her father changed—a bitter scowl darkened his visage. It was seldom—very seldom—that his daughter ventured to brave him, but when she did, he invariably gave way.

"Alice," he said, after a momentary struggle, "you will one day urge me too far; but since you will have it so, send the woman in—I'll see her!"

The fair girl left the room without a word, in search of Mabel.

"This comes," continued the miser, "of having children—sullen and disobedient children—who would rob us of our gold whilst living, or squander it when we are dead! She shall never squander mine—I'll bury it first, where human hand can never find it! I should like to spread my winding sheet upon it! I could sleep soundly then—soundly," he added; "the grave would have lost its terrors!"

The old man resumed the examination of his books—the record of his gains—of a long life of grinding privation and oppression. One item sorely displeased him—it was the large amount of his wife's fortune—by right the inheritance of Alice—the miser had not even a life-interest in it: and yet he had used it—managed it, and considered it for so many years as his own, that he bitterly resented the slightest allusion to his daughter's claims upon it.

"Would she were dead!" he kept muttering; "would she were dead!"

CHAPTER X.

Forth to the world she goes! one only hope
Sustains her feeble steps—a mother's hope—
Which clings through time and distance to her child—
Trusts against reason, faithful to itself. CREON.

WHEN Alice returned, accompanied by Mabel and Bandy-legged Jem—the latter carrying the chair—her father was so absorbed by his books, that she was obliged to touch him on the shoulder, to call his attention to his visitors, who stood at a respectful distance from the table.

"Ah—yes! I recollect!" exclaimed the old man, pettishly. "Well!" he added, looking up, and eyeing his visitor sharply, "you have come to beg a service of me? Every one begs—few pay! Had you not connived at the escape of your rascally husband, I should have done something handsome for you, certainly—something very handsome!"

"Yes!" muttered Jem; "rattled his money in her ear, and paid her with the chink of his gold! That's all she would ever wring from him!"

"As it is," continued the old man, "we are quits! I have lost the reward for his apprehension—fifty pounds! Fifty pounds!" he repeated. "It would have been the making of me—for I am poor—miserably poor!"

"In spirit I'll swear he is!" mentally exclaimed the postilion. "His heart, like his money-box, is of iron, and opens with a screw!"

"I merely did my duty, sir!" replied Mabel, humbly. "And the service I ask will not cost you much. It is merely to take charge of an old chair, which I dearly prize! It was my young lady's gift to me—the only memorial I possess of her past kindness! You cannot wonder that I value it!"

"It's a weakness to value anything," observed Nicholas Arden, testily, "except money! Well—for the chair, I don't care if I oblige you, although it will take up a great deal of room, and ought to be paid for! There, you may leave it!"

"And this poor bird!" added his visitor, in a suppliant tone.

"Who is to feed it?" exclaimed the miser, angrily. "It will eat me out of house and home! I am beggared already, by an extravagant child and a hungry servant, whose appetite is as insatiable as the grave! Would it could be filled as cheaply! How am I to be repaid for its food?"

Mabel faltered something about its song.

"Song!" repeated the man of gold; "I hate songs! Take it away—make money of it! You will find some fool to purchase it!"

"Father," whispered his daughter Alice, "remember your promise! It shall be at no charge to you; I will gather the groundsel and seeds in the garden! Perhaps," she added, with a sigh, "it may cheer me in my solitude!"

Poor Mabel's heart was ready to break. It is the last drop which makes the cup flow over. The bird had been a pet—the plaything of her lost child: and the idea of selling it—she could have wanted bread first.

"Come, sir," said Jem, for the first time speaking aloud, "you can't refuse! The bird is a goldfinch!"

This was uttered in a half-sarcastic, half-persuasive tone, as if he fancied that the word "gold" was the only key to the old man's heart.

"Well, well," answered Nicholas Arden, at last, "you may leave it! I will trust to your honesty to repay me, if ever you have the means; if not, I suppose I must sell it!"

"Or eat it!" thought the postilion.

Ungracious as the permission was, the disconsolate woman thankfully accepted it, and was about to leave the room, when the miser called her back, and inquired, with an air of affected indifference, how she intended to dispose of herself?

"I am about to seek my child, sir," replied Mabel, bursting into tears, "who was stolen from me the night my dear young lady died! I'll seek her through the world, but I will find her!"

"The world is a wide place!" was the sneering comment.

"Is it wider than a mother's heart?" demanded his visitor.

"Women are strange beings!" ejaculated the old man. "That's true!" exclaimed Bandy-legged Jem; "and plagu' hard to drive! Uneasy with a curb, and apt to shy if you trust them in a snaffle! That's why I have always remained a bachelor! Know too much for them!"

"Miss Briancourt's child, I heard," resumed the miser, "was taken at the same time yours was stolen? At least I heard so—eh?"

"Mrs. George Stanley's child was, sir!" answered Mabel, colouring deeply—for she could with difficulty restrain her indignation.

Nicholas Arden smiled incredulously, and asked if she were simple enough to believe in the tale of their marriage.

"I am certain of it!" was the reply.

"Where?" demanded the old man.

Alice saw, from the vivacity of her father's manner, that he felt deeply interested in the question. Bitter experience had proved to her, that where money was concerned he had few scruples, either of honesty or conscience; and she made a sign to Mabel not to answer him.

"I cannot tell you where!" replied the woman. "I spoke from my knowledge of her purity and worth! She knew both misery and poverty—the thousand ills that wring and break the heart; but never shame!"

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Nicholas Arden, in a tone of disappointment; "she was a woman!"

The cynic little knew how much of goodness, suffering, patient endurance, and affection are comprised in that one word, "woman"—the name for slaves, whose chains are twined with flowers; and because they are so twined, man, the heartless taskmaster, expects his slave to smile, as if the iron did not corrode and fester in the soul, despite the wreaths which hide it.

"Well," continued the miser, "should you succeed and discover both the children, let me know: I will pay you," he added, reluctantly, "for your trouble; that is, provided I receive the first intelligence!"

"You, sir!" said Mabel, with unfeigned surprise.

"What interest can you have in the lost child of Mrs. Stanley?" demanded his daughter Alice.

"Interest! None, child—none! But we must do something sometimes, from humanity!"

"True!" observed the postilion, sarcastically. "Take half per cent. less when the security is unexceptionable! It's my belief that the children warn't stolen at all!"

"Not stolen?" replied Mabel.

"If they were," continued Jem, "your husband stole 'em! I took him a note from Lawyer Quirk, the very night the poor lady died; and I know that Ned was on friendly terms with the old rascal—for he assisted him to escape from the hall, after the constable and I had taken him: I was watching in the park, and saw it!"

"Saw Lawyer Quirk release your prisoner from the hall?" eagerly repeated the old man.

"At least I as good as saw him! It could have been no one else!"

Nicholas Arden made a hasty memorandum in a ponderous ledger, with brass clasps, which was on the table.

"There—that will do," he said; "you may go. I know where to find you, should I require your evidence."

All but Mabel were convinced that Bandy-legged Jem had spoken the truth; but she still doubted it. Her husband's grief and rage at the loss of little Meg, whom he idolised, had been too real to be affected. Ned had both cursed and beaten her for what he called her negligence and folly; and, bad as he was, her woman's heart would not suspect him of having invented an excuse for the mere pleasure of ill-using her.

She entered into no explanation, but took her leave of the miser, after once more thanking him for his kindness, and, accompanied by Alice, who carried the bird, and Jem, left the room.

"You have brought the bird?" observed Mabel to Miss Arden.

The poor girl coloured deeply, for she could not explain her reasons, without lessening, if possible, the opinion which her visitors already entertained of her father. The fact was, she was fearful lest the old miser, in his avarice, should wring the neck of the little songster, to save the ruinous expense of keeping it.

She murmured something, therefore, about its being better in her care than her father's.

THE LATE EARTHQUAKE IN PERSIA.

A RUSSIAN JOURNAL publishes a letter, dated the 14th May, from M. Fagergren, a Swedish physician in the service of Persia, which gives the following further details of the earthquake at Schiraz, on the 21st of April:

"You already know that the town of Schiraz no longer exists—having been completely destroyed by an earthquake. Up to this time the shocks have not completely finished, and God knows when we shall be relieved from our anxieties. It is impossible for me to describe the horror of the first shock, which lasted for five minutes. All the inhabitants were asleep—from which they were awakened by a noise louder than that of thunder, and by a mass of stones falling into their rooms. This, at least, is what occurred to me. My first idea was to fly; and I was fortunate enough to reach the centre of the large court, with those who resided in the house, when it fell to the ground. The immensity of this disaster was only visible when daylight appeared.

"On every side the eye could see nothing but a heap of ruins—streets blocked up with stones, and dead bodies being carried on litters without the walls of the town. It made the heart bleed to see the limbs of persons showing themselves from beneath piles of rubbish, and men, women, and children, endeavouring to withdraw the mutilated bodies of their friends and relations from beneath the ruins, which, in their despair, they were tearing away with their teeth, their hands, and their nails. Out of several thousand victims, the lives of only a very small number were saved. These scenes were repeated for five days—during which it is calculated that 12,000 persons perished. On the fourth day, large bands of brigands made their appearance, and plundered the unfortunate inhabitants—who were without defence and without asylum—of what little they had been able to save from the ruins. For three days the town was delivered up to the pillage of these brigands, whose numbers were increased by a report that Begler Bey, the Pacha of Schiraz, was among the dead. Shocks are still felt three or four times a day, and are so violent, that the houses which have resisted former shocks, are falling to the ground one after the other. My life, and that of my wife, have been saved; but all that I had made since my arrival in this country is lost. I purchased a house three months ago, which is now nothing but a heap of ruins."

[THE COMMANDER OF THE CAMP AT CHOBHAM.]

LORD SEATON.

THE commander of the forces encamped on Chobham Common, is well-known to fame, as one of the most experienced generals of the age. He is, in almost every military respect, the exact counterpart of the late Duke of Wellington. We had occasion, lately, to refer in terms of eulogium to his tactics. He manoeuvres with the fixed object in view, of making the most of a small army. That was the great point in the soldierly character and career of the Great Duke. The generals of Napoleon in the Peninsula, always liked to imitate the example of their great master. They preferred to move to the attack in columns, just as the old Romans did. Wellington, on the contrary, always fought in line when he was able, but as much from choice as necessity: and by that means not only lessened the exposure of his troops to the fire of the enemy, but was able to impress them with an idea of his being in more formidable force than he ever really was. His astonishing victories in the Peninsula are partially accounted for, when we examine this favourite disposition of his army with attention. Having his flanks well protected, his lines—two or three deep, more frequently only two—when broken, were quickly re-formed in the rear. He had abundance of room in which to move and re-organise. With the French it was quite different. Advancing to the attack in column, they not only presented a solid block of human material—a living target to the murderous fire of artillery—but were assailable on the sides, and when broken or obliged to retreat, could only do so in disorder. In fact, when once the head of a French column was turned, and their flanks were torn by the cross fire of their antagonists in line, their defeat invariably followed; and then, as at Waterloo, Vittoria, and the great battle of Salamanca, it was not a retreat, but a total and hideous rout.

Lord Seaton having been bred in this Wellingtonian school of war, clings with fond fidelity to all its traditions; and during the past summer has shown us how battles may be won by little armies, when opposed to large ones. His displays at Chobham have been pronounced by competent authorities to be the very best of which the military science, as practised by Wellington, is capable. The able and experienced general was conspicuous in all his complicated arrangements. Leaving nothing undone, he took care not to do much. Risking nothing by impetuosity, he would gain everything by skill, intrepidity, and steady valour. In short, he has afforded us a very lively idea of what a British general is and should be. And in presenting our readers with an engraved portrait of his lineaments, which in the field bear a marked resemblance to those of his late great commander, we must state that Lord Seaton, both by birth and services, eminently deserved the distinguished position of being the chief of the first army assembled in England during the past thirty-eight years. He is descended from an old Devonshire family, and married a lady who was also a native of the same county. His family is large, consisting of five sons and four daughters. Three of his sons are in the army—one of them is aide-de-camp to the present Governor-General of Canada. He himself is now in his 77th year, having been born in 1776.

He entered the army in the year 1794, being then in his 18th year, as Ensign Colborne. After passing through the usual military gradations with the highest distinction, and having been present in some of the most important battles in the Peninsula, this distinguished officer became familiarly known as Sir John Colborne. His services at Corunna, under Sir John Moore, won for him the honour of a cross and three clasps. At Albuera, he had the honour, in conjunction with Lord Hardinge, of retrieving the fortunes of the day, and regaining a battle which had been given up as lost. He was also in the battles of Ciudad Rodrigo, Nivelle, Nive, Orthes, Toulouse, and Waterloo; and he wears one of the old war decorations so long withheld, and but lately distributed through the persevering exertions of his Grace the Duke of Richmond. But it is not in his own country alone that Lord Seaton enjoys the highest military distinctions: Austria has conferred on him the Order of Maria Theresa; Russia, the Order of St. George; and Portugal, the Order of the Tower and Sword; and he has received the honour of the Guelphic Order from Hanover. His lordship served in Holland, Egypt, the Mediterranean, the Peninsula, France, and the Netherlands. In 1838, he was made lieutenant-general and colonel, at the same time, of the 26th Cameronians, on which occasion he was invested with the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath.

Lord Seaton has been no less distinguished as a statesman and civil governor, than as an able and successful general. As Lieutenant-Governor-General of Guernsey; as Commander-in-Chief, and afterwards Governor-General of Canada; and as Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, his lordship—on successive occasions, in each and all of these capacities—gave convincing proofs of the profoundest sagacity, and the possession of the higher order of governing power and administrative ability. It was reserved, however, for his career in Canada to procure for him the honours of elevation to the peerage, with a seat in the House of Lords, and a pension of £2000 a year. This took place during the Melbourne Administration, a period of great difficulty in Canadian affairs, and when the Home Government was considerably embarrassed by the unexpected return of the Earl of Durham from his post as Governor-General of Canada. The exciting debates which took place in both Houses of Parliament, on that extraordinary occasion, must still be fresh in the recollection of most of our readers. Lord Seaton was then commander of the forces in Canada, and was also appointed Governor-General and Vice-Admiral. So firm, yet conciliatory, was his administration in this double capacity, that, notwithstanding a great portion of both the Canadas was in open rebellion, he succeeded in establishing the permanence of British rule, conciliated the disaffected, and re-established peace. In 1839 he was created Baron Seaton, of Seaton, in the county of Devon-

A ROMANCE OF SAVOY.

CHAPTER V.

It was about a week after this snatched conversation that Balmat finished his work, and it was on the very evening that her prison was prepared for her that he met her, unattended, on a little path leading to the Glacier des Bois, and down which he was coming, in that elastic mood a little while ago described. It seemed as if she met him purposely, or as if fate had thrown her in his way.

"Why, Adrienne, how is this?" asked he, stopping short from sheer surprise, so strong as to check for a moment the current of pleasant feeling which this sudden meeting might have been thought to have confirmed. But such is human nature: the very presence of the object we long for, or the coming of the moment we expect with panting impatience, instantly—but for an instant—paralysing the sense of enjoyment. But the compensation soon follows.

Before Adrienne could reply, Balmat had more than recovered his previous tone. He glowed with one of the purest and finest feelings of which man is susceptible. He was, for the first time in his life, unrestrictedly alone with the only human being for whom he ever knew a sentiment of kindness.

Brothers, who grow up, or fathers, who (alas!) grow down with this every-day indulgence, can know little of the hearty rapture which our rude and ruffian hero now revelled in. He was too uncivilised to refine or fritter it away. He spoke not a word; but, holding little Adrienne by the two hands, he looked down on her face, which beamed brightly in the twilight mist, and, unconscious of what was working within him, he felt the warm drops chasing each other on his cheeks. Imagine the intense luxury of a first flood of tears, in mature manhood, and from excess of pleasure, in such a mind as Balmat's. The prophet's wand did not work a greater miracle nor touch so pure a source.

"What makes you weep, Monsieur Balmat? Are you unhappy, then?" asked Adrienne, with a compassionate voice.

"No, indeed I am not," said he, quickly; "far from it, my little friend; and I know not why I shed those foolish tears—the first I ever shed. But do tell me how it happens that I meet you here, so late in the evening, and alone?"

"Oh, I'll tell you that! My father is gone to Martigny, not to be at home till morning; mamma is watching beside poor little Florent; the other children are in bed, fast asleep; and Madelon, the servant girl, is gone to Chamouni, to see her sick aunt. So I thought I would walk out a little farther than usual—for, ever since you spoke to me about it, I am longing to go high up into the mountains."

"And you are really not afraid—not afraid of being alone?"

"No!"

"Nor of being with me?"

"Oh, no—no! I like to be with you!"

"How very extraordinary that is!" exclaimed Balmat, half aloud and half to himself; for he could scarcely believe it possible that an exception existed to the repugnance and dread he knew himself to inspire.

"Did no one see you leave the house?" was his next question.

"No one! They think I am asleep by this time!"

"Then, since you are not afraid of me, shall we now take the walk we talked of?"

"Yes, if you like! But you must bring me home again—because you know papa and mamma might be uneasy about me!"

"To be sure they might," said Balmat.

And so they walked along back, on that path which was perfectly new to Adrienne, and which her companion had little expected to re-tread so soon. Nothing could exceed the affectionate manner in which he conversed with her. It seemed as though the long-prisoned kindness, which exists in the roughest natures, like honey-drops in some coarse weed, had been hitherto garnered up to sweeten that mountain tête-à-tête.

Adrienne, on her part, was still more animated than he. Happily for her, she had not yet reached the age when sensibility is purchased at the price of anxiety and pain. But all enjoyments must be paid for one way or another—and that, like the rest, is worth its price. Our little heroine seemed to have taken a new step in life. The monotony of her former existence was broken, and she had reached one of those epochs so important in the career of every one, but which so many pass heedlessly over at the time, and lose the sight and almost the memory of, at more advanced periods. From this evening, if Adrienne reckoned rightly in after-life, she might calculate a whole host of sentiments that sprang at that moment into being.

As they wound their way up the rugged path, old Time seemed to fly to the mountain-tops. They knew nothing of his presence. Daylight was entirely gone, but the moon streamed out its radiance, and the grass and wild flowers glittered like liquid diamonds in the dew. The awful rocks piled perpendicularly up the sloping glaciers, and the deep masses of snow that crowned the hills, tinted with shades of violet-coloured light, wore a hue of brilliancy. Frothy cascades floated here and there down the side of the hoar granite, and the murmur they sent out harmonised with the fairy splendour of the scene.

The magnificent desolation, the mighty solitude through which she wandered, filled Adrienne's mind with a holy wonderment. She seemed to have reached another, a loftier, a more ethereal world. She felt like a being of the clouds. Her soul was wrapped in folds of enchantment. But she attempted to give no expression to her doubt. Young as she was, she had tact enough to perceive that her companion had no sympathy with her vague rapture, and that any talk about it would have been but a check and an intrusion.

Balmat the while talked on, and Adrienne answered frankly and fearlessly every question which he put, and every remark he made. She was quite at her ease, and as familiar as he could desire with him; but she was too much impressed with awe at those far-hidden depths of romance to breathe even a word of the wonder with which she gazed around. Such was the double state of feeling inspired by this her first acquaintanceship with the ways of man and the mysteries of nature.

They reached the rebuilt hut. Balmat opened the door. Adrienne unhesitatingly entered; and when he struck a light from his tinder-box, and illumed the lamp, which he had already trimmed, upon the table, she, for whom his elaborate preparations were made, looked round with a pleasant astonishment, which repaid him amply for all.

"Adrienne," said Balmat, "everything you see here is yours—your own—the house and all that it contains."

What an announcement for an ambitious and an independent-minded child! Adrienne, in her turn, wept plentiful tears of joy.

"Yes, Adrienne, everything—you are not only tenant, but proprietor, just as much as your father is of his mill, or I of mine. And look here!" continued Balmat, opening one of the boxes, and taking out two or three dresses which he had bought at random in a neighbouring village; "and see, here are needles and thread, and other materials ready, to alter them if they do not fit you quite—for I know what a good workwoman you are, and how you make all your own clothes, and your brothers' as well. And see here—and here—and here!" as, at each new word, he produced shoes, stockings, and a silk handkerchief, and other little articles of finery, which he laid out on the table with an air of a shopman tempting a purchaser.

"And you have bought all these beautiful things for me?" asked Adrienne, through sobs and smiles.

"Yes, I have bought them for you, my little friend, and I am glad—very glad—to see you so pleased with them!"

"Oh, it is not with them I am so pleased—though they are all very beautiful—but with you, M. Balmat! How good you are! Ah, I wish my father and mother were here to see all this, and they would think very differently of you from what they do think!"

"Well, well—let us not talk of them now!" and a frown—a slight one—passed over Gabriel's brow as he spoke.

"No, not now, but another time—many another time—we must talk of them, for I am resolved to make you like each other."

"Very well—very well! we shall see that, Adrienne."

"We shall see it, certainly!" echoed the child, with her own emphasis: and it was strange that Balmat listened rather pleasantly than the contrary, to a tone of decision completely averse to his wishes and opinions.

The second box contained a slight store of provisions—bread, dried meats, eggs, and the like. A delicious spring ran, as in most Alpine chalets, close to the house, and was turned into it and through it, inclosed in a wooden frame, forming a constant stream for the purpose of keeping the milk-pails cool, and their contents fresh and sweet. The little rivulet had trickled and gurgled on for years, as though it mocked the desolation through which it took its course; but it was not furnished with the wonted contents of former times. Adrienne had not yet obtained the luxury of fresh milk in her retreat.

After every separate treasure had been examined by the new "proprietor"—the pictures and the books particularly—Adrienne, as if struck by a sudden thought, fixed her eyes on her patron, and asked him:

"What am I to do with all these things, M. Balmat? For what purpose have you fitted up this place so nicely?"

"Why, for your comfort and convenience, my dear little Adrienne. You are to enjoy yourself here, and make use of all these things to amuse and occupy you."

"But you are going to take me back home?"

"And I will, but not to-night, Adrienne."

"I thought as much!" said she, with a reflective, and by no means a reproachful or frightened air.

"Will you be afraid to pass the night here, Adrienne?"

"Not in the least, provided you will let my parents know in the morning that I am safe and well."

"Are you sure that you can be content to sleep here alone?"

"Quite sure; and I shall like it beyond everything, if you will promise me that you will remove my father's uneasiness at my absence from home."

"You shall do that yourself," said Gabriel, producing pen, ink, and paper; and Adrienne wrote, at his dictation, two lines, in her girlish and rude, but bold and original hand, just to say that she was perfectly safe and very happy. Gabriel folded the missive, and promised the writer that it should be safely delivered at the mill the next morning.

"And now, Adrienne," said he, "it is time for supper!" And she perfectly agreeing with him, they set about preparing their homely repast, with appetites sharpened by the new and wild excitement they respectively enjoyed.

Never was supper eaten with more zest, and the running spring, in temperate draughts of which they pledged each other's health, was not more animated than her feelings, nor more pure than his. The business of the table over, an increasing degree of spirit entered into the conversation, which flowed uninterrupted, except once or twice, when the loud crash of an avalanche echoed like thunder through the moonlit glen. The sound was familiar to Adrienne's ears, for the frequent falls of the ice-blocks of the mer de glace was within close hearing of the paternal home.

"Not sleepy yet, Adrienne?" said Balmat, after full two hours' chat on many subjects of local and domestic tendency, and perceiving through the open door that the moon had shifted its position far to the westward, as if to make room for the sunbeams that were ere long to follow its track.

"Sleepy—no! it would be a shame for me to get tired talking with you, who have done so much to make me happy!"

"You must go to rest, notwithstanding, to enable you to enjoy all this the better. Tell me, then, before I leave you for the night, what is there you wish for besides?"

"Oh, nothing!"

Balmat smiled.

"Now, then, I must wish you good night, my little propriétaire!" said he, rising; "I hope you will sleep well and have nice dreams, and that I shall find you refreshed and in good spirits in the morning. I shall be with you early."

"And you will not forget the letter for papa?"

"No, no—you may depend on that!"

"Well, now, before you leave me, will you answer me one question, my good Monsieur Balmat?" asked Adrienne, with an arch and earnest air.

"Let me hear it first?"

"Then why did you take all this wonderful trouble with this beautiful little place, and for what purpose have you brought me here?"

"That makes two questions, Adrienne!" said Balmat, kissing her forehead, and smiling; "and, if you are a good girl, I will answer them both together, to-morrow morning, at breakfast."

A few words more of advice to her, not to be alarmed at any unusual sounds she might hear during the night, and assurances of perfect safety from any intrusion, with some replies of security and satisfaction on her part, closed the colloquy, and the two friends separated: she to stretch herself on her romantic couch, and he, after carefully locking the door outside, and carrying off the key, to wend his way once more along the oft-trodden path towards Chamouni.

But this was not the last time of his tracing the same road that night. Buoyed up by the intense fancy that had taken possession of his mind, and making light of trouble or fatigue, when the pleasure of his object was in question, he proceeded to the out-house in Jean Carrier's farm, where the goats were tethered, and, carefully selecting the favourite of Adrienne, he muzzled it with his handkerchief, so as to prevent an alarm, and, at intervals carrying and leading it by a piece of cord, brought with him for the purpose, and driving it along, he retraced every step of the two hours' road, till he reached the chalet again, and he fastened the abducted animal to one of the window-bars, with sufficient length of cord to enable it to browse plentifully on the abounding herbage that grew close up to the walls. Gabriel was, perhaps, in a great measure, induced to this enterprise, as well by the wish to astonish and delight his little favourite, as by having a good excuse for coming up again to see how she became reconciled to her prison. He accordingly peeped in through the window-bars—for it was now clear daylight—and he had the pleasure of seeing her fast asleep on the little couch.

He was soon again on the road, and, on gaining the valley, he first went to the village, where not a soul was yet stirring, and, popping Adrienne's letter into the receiving box at the post-office, he sought his home, with a free conscience and a light heart. What followed is already known to the reader.

CHAPTER VI.

It will be remembered that as soon as poor Carrier and his wife left Balmat's house, after the fruitless attempt to acquire tidings of their missing child, he who so brutally repulsed their entreaties for information, also disappeared from the scene. It need hardly be stated, that he had set out by a circuitous path, on a visit to his little prisoner. He had effected his object of leaving no proof in the hands of her parents, that she was concealed in his premises, or that he shrank from a prompt and minute search. While he took his upward way through the wood on the road to Montanvert, and was soon lost to the eyes of the most inquisitive or suspicious of his neighbours, the unhappy parents, baffled in their best chance of success, had repaired to the village magistrate, detailed their misfortune, and loudly demanded inquiry, assistance, and, if possible, redress. All that could be granted to them was granted—namely, a summons for the appearance of old Jeannette, with the men employed about Balmat's mill, and subsequently a strict search in the premises. This order was instantly obeyed; but the examination, which was forthwith proceeded on, produced no result. The men evidently knew nothing of their master's doings, and the old woman explained her somewhat doubtful expressions to Carrier, by the very natural and laudable feeling of a wish to give him at least the consolation of hope.

In the meantime, the report of Adrienne's disappearance had spread through the village, and reached the post-office. The attention of the antiquated female functionary who did the internal duties of that important branch of administration, was thus drawn to the billet found in the box to Carrier's address. On ordinary occasions it might and would have lain for days unheeded, in the narrow recipient of mountain correspondence; but the good-nature of the woman overcame the indifference of the postmistress, and her old, hobbling letter-carrier was dispatched in all speed—and that was not of mercurial quality—to convey the document that promised a chance of relief to the afflicted father and mother. This announcement of her safety, in Adrienne's well-known handwriting, was indeed a world of comfort to them. And the strange fact of her favourite goat having also disappeared, seemed to carry conviction that both were somewhere together, and that not in any distant retreat. No one imagined the possibility of their both being a league up in the mountains. And so the matter rested for awhile, speculation and reflection utterly failing to throw any decided light on the truth.

When Balmat reached the chalet, which was during the magisterial inquiry just mentioned, he found everything as he had left it a few days before, except that the sun now lighted up with all its splendour the grey and misty beauties of the morning landscape. The goat browsed patiently in the rich herbage, and no sound save the murmuring of the rock-formed cataracts broke the stillness of the scene. Gabriel peeped once more through the window-bars, and saw that Adrienne still slept. Gently loosening the string which bound the goat, and unlocking the door of the hut, he let the animal walk in, and he watched the effect. It began at first to toss about the leafy and mossy carpet, and to nibble at some of its most tender materials; but in a few minutes it came up to the couch, and—whether it recognised its young mistress or not, is beyond the reach of our philosophy—it instantly set up its wonted note of tremulous bleating, standing close to the object which its voice seemed calling into consciousness. Adrienne suddenly started up, rubbed her eyes with both hands, looked round and round the chamber, fixed her gaze for a moment on the window, then let it fall on the still bleating animal, which she as instantly embraced with animated delight, while it licked her face and returned her caresses, with a thousand grotesque yet affectionate gambols. Adrienne next rose from her reclining posture, and Balmat as instantly retired, to allow her an opportunity of arranging her simple toilet unobstructedly. As he walked aside, he threw up his eyes and hands in wonder—not at the familiar objects of romantic grandeur which surrounded the scene, but at the amazing change in his own nature, which had never till then known a sentiment of delicacy.

In a little while Adrienne was out on the green sward which surrounded the hut, and she ran affectionately towards Balmat, followed by her recovered favourite, and, with looks beaming with gratitude, she thanked him again and again for the kindness he had done her. She inquired how he managed to bring the goat up so long and difficult a road. Balmat replied, that to come to those one loved such obstacles were as nothing: and though his answer was meant to apply to the animal, Adrienne did not fail to attach its meaning to Gabriel's self. She took it for granted that he had seen her parents, and obtained the goat with their consent—for though she had most pleasant dreams, she never dreamed of the fact of his stolen expedition, and the double journey he had made since supper-time. He admitted his having seen her father and mother, and assured her that her letter had quite satisfied them.

"And now, Adrienne, you must think of your house-keeping," said Balmat, turning from her homeward theme. "I will make the fire. Here is a packet of coffee which I have brought with me, and a few fresh-laid eggs which I picked up in my own hen-house: so that, with the bread, butter, cheese, and honey in store within, I think we shall make a breakfast that the Syndic of Sallanche might envy us for!"

In a few minutes more the labour thus suggested was acted on: and in due time they prepared and finished their repast, with a gusto only known to the inhabitants or visitors of high regions, and the possessors of high spirits. A walk into the deeper recesses of the glen was next proposed by Balmat, and gladly acceded to by Adrienne—for she longed to explore the beauties of the place, which she had as yet scarcely seen, except in the brilliant yet vague glimpses of the moon. They wandered along and rambled about, and talked in a desultory manner of many subjects—all of them nearly as new to one as the other. They were in many points on a par of very strange equality. It is custom alone which gives manhood the superiority over childhood in matters of taste and feeling. The full-grown inexperience of Gabriel, who had never known the advantages of reciprocated sympathy, reduced him quite to a level with his companion's girlish tone of reasoning, on every topic beyond the mere material occupations in which his life had been passed; while the animation of her more lively intellect actually took the lead in many points of the conversation, which turned chiefly on the nature of the new-formed and anomalous friendship which had so marvellously sprung up between them: and thus their talk was like that of two young and uninformed tyros, rather than the converse of a pair whose disparity of years and difference of sex were in keeping with their widely discrepant characters. They interchanged ideas, and mingled comments, and bandied questions and answers, with a total absence of the timidity of ignorance on one hand, and the assumption of knowledge on the other. Maturity and childhood met each other half way: and that morning's conversation—perhaps unparalleled in its kind—possessed all the wild freshness and vivacity of youth and innocence.

Balmat's constant exercise and total want of rest or the previous four-and-twenty hours, had tired out his robust frame, and his mental excitement during that period called for repose. So, after wandering about for an hour or more, he sat down on a tufted bed of wild thyme, in the shadow of a granite block, with Adrienne by his side, her apron filled with a dozen varieties of bright and fragrant flowers, heretofore unknown to her comparatively lowland experience.

"And now you will keep your last night's promise?"

and she carelessly tossing her floral treasures about, and archly looking up at the murky countenance of her companion. "You will now tell me why you brought me here, and how long you mean me to remain, and what I am to do, in this beautiful desert?"

"Certainly, I will tell you all that!" replied Balmat, with a smile which changed the expression of his face into something like good looks; "and I hope you will quite understand me, my dear little Adrienne! Now, in the first place, you know very well that every one in the world—except yourself, perhaps—hates me—and I must confess that I hate every one but you, Adrienne. I am, just lately, ever since your little brother fell into the river, thinking that it is a terrible thing not to love some one or other, and to have nobody that really loves me. I therefore have encouraged rather than repressed that fancy which I took for you so suddenly. I have found myself gradually, day by day, liking you better and better—and in proportion as I liked you better, I seemed to like myself better. There is something within me, Adrienne, that won't let me scatter my good-nature about the world upon every one, as the wind blows the flowers and buds in all directions; it is more like the sun, fixing its beams in this little glen—and—and—"

"Yes, Monsieur Balmat, but the sun shines upon the mountains and valleys also," said Adrienne, completely demolishing Gabriel's already broken metaphor.

"Well, that was not exactly what I meant!" said he, somewhat abruptly, and in a self-dissatisfied tone. "What I mean is, that my feelings, such as they are, are of a fixed and positive kind, and I can't bear to like more than one person; and now I find that I can like one, I am capable of going any lengths in my love for that one."

"And I am that one?" asked Adrienne, putting her hand on Balmat's.

"Yes, on my sacred word, Adrienne, you are—and there is nothing I wouldn't do for your happiness!" replied he, taking up the little hand in his coarse one, and putting it to his lips; but, astonished at this stretch of gallantry, he laid it down softly again beside him, without kissing it.

"Well, then," said Adrienne, briskly, "come with me now to our mill, and make friends with my father."

"No, Adrienne—no; I cannot do that—that is to say, not all at once! You must give me time. The first thing to be sure of, is your affection for me. If I can secure that, I am afraid I must come to better terms with your father and mother. That is the worst of it—but I have made up my mind, for even that."

"Then why didn't you at once shake hands with them weeks ago, and come to see us every day at the mill, and make us all happy? Surely that would have been the best way for all our sakes, instead of giving yourself the great trouble you have done here."

"Adrienne, I never could have brought myself to visit your father, on the chance of making you like me. My pride would not let me expose my weakness before him and the rest of your family. Besides, you would not have liked me there; you would have seen in me nothing but my bad qualities. But here I have you to myself. You have a proof, in all I have done here, how very much I must love you; and, by being here alone with me, you may in a little time with me, find out whether you really can like me, and how much."

"Well, but after all, I must by-and-by see you mixing with other people. We cannot always live alone in this place."

"Not here, Adrienne. But I have a notion that we may find a place still more lonely, though a great deal larger than this, far off—away beyond the mountains, and beyond the sea—in a strange country, where we should meet none of the odious people who live here! What would you think of that?"

"I can't bear to think of it at all. Nothing would make me give up my dear papa and mamma, and my brothers and sisters—and I know no odious people! I am sure the neighbours all round us are very kind and very good!"

"Adrienne, you must not speak of them in that way! I hate them all!"

"Then, how can you like me, who like them all so much?"

"That I do not know!" said Balmat, seriously. "But it is certain that I do like you as much as I hate the rest!"

"Then, perhaps for my sake, you will like them by-and-by."

"Perhaps so! God knows what effect you may produce on me; but you must love me first, Adrienne—and it is for the chance of that, that I have brought you here. So let us forget all the stupid people who live elsewhere, and see what we can do for each other here!"

"I am sure I can never do enough for you, Monsieur Balmat, in return for all you have done for me already!"

"My dear Adrienne, you have done more for me, without knowing it, than, perhaps, I can ever do for you. You have opened my eyes on my own heart, and enabled me to see down far into its depths! God bless you, Adrienne!" he added, squeezing her little hands together in both of his. But he immediately loosed his hold, and covered his eyes with his broad palms; and, turning suddenly round, laid his face earthward, and neither spoke nor moved for some minutes.

Adrienne watched him quietly for awhile, then gently rose up, and waited away a little distance. She went once towards the goat and played with it, looking still at Balmat. She then stepped softly up beside him. His hands had fallen from his face; and while she saw that he was fast asleep, she observed the trickling mark of a tear, that had come from his closed lids, and moistened his snowy cheek.

It was full two hours before Gabriel awoke. His awakening was electrical. He sprang at once on his feet, looked round in every direction, and, not perceiving Adrienne anywhere, he ran to the hut, then in a moment emerged from it, and was hastening along the path which he had himself formed, towards the opening of the glen, on the way to Chamouni, when he was arrested by a burst of childish laughter, faintly heard, and, looking upward, he perceived the object of his search sitting on a projecting ledge of granite, far above him, her goat by her side, her own head and the neck of the animal fancifully decorated with wreaths of wild flowers, a quantity of which little Adrienne amused herself by scattering down towards her astonished, pleased, but somewhat alarmed friend. For, mixed with his delight to find that she had not escaped from him, was an almost involuntary shudder, on observing the perilous position to which she had climbed, and sat perched on, with an apparent unconsciousness of danger. This absence of nervousness in situations of risk, arises from a reckless disposition, or a confidence in one's own resources. The latter was the case with Adrienne; and Balmat was already impressed with a sufficient insight into her character, to be convinced of it. He therefore made no ill-judged effort to hurry to her relief, nor did he show any anxiety; but, sending up a kind gesture or two, in token of recognition and satisfaction, he beckoned her down, with a coaxing air. Agile and sure-footed, because sure-headed, Adrienne made little difficulty about the means of descent. She stepped from stone to stone, and clung by whatever wild grass or weeds she could grasp at on her way; stopping from time to time to wait a salute to the admiring and expectant Gabriel, or to call her goat, who respectfully followed her track, as if taking a lesson from her prudent activity. In a few minutes she had come down from a height that it must have required an hour to ascend to; and when she touched the grass-covered earth again, Balmat could not resist the impulse to take her in his arms, and for the first time he impressed a kiss on either side of her flushed and animated face.

"I gave you a nice fright, didn't I?" said Adrienne, laughing.

"Why, certainly I was alarmed to see you in so dangerous a place; and really, my little friend, it was very imprudent."

"Come, come, Monsieur Balmat, it is not that I mean, and you know very well it was not that which frightened you so much—but you thought I had run away home! I know you did, and it was that which made me laugh at you!"

"No, I assure you, my dear Adrienne, I couldn't believe that, because—"

"Then why did you hurry off so fast, after looking for me in the chalet? Ah, Monsieur Balmat, you see it is no use—you cannot deceive me!"

"Nor do I wish it, Adrienne! But—"

"But what? You are afraid to confide in me: isn't that it?"

"No, not exactly that—but you are very young, and you do not yet quite know your own mind, and you know me scarcely at all, and so—"

"And so you are resolved to keep me as a sort of prisoner in this delightful place, notwithstanding that I am so happy in it I would not leave it for the whole wide world!"

"Not for the whole wide world, Adrienne—but perhaps you would for that little bit of it on which your father's mill is now standing? Eh! confess it now in your turn, Mademoiselle Adrienne—were you not very much disposed to run off towards home, when you thought I was sleeping just now?"

"Oh, fie, Monsieur Balmat! thought you were sleeping! You know very well you did sleep most soundly; and it is quite as true that I never dreamed of going home. I might easily have done so if I chose it!"

"Then why didn't you?"

"Because I think it would be very dishonourable to you, after all the pains you have taken to make this place so nice for me; but I fairly tell you, Monsieur Balmat, that as soon as I get tired of being here, I will escape from it, unless you let me go away freely."

"Well, Adrienne, that is fair warning, and now we understand each other; and I promise you solemnly, that whenever you tell me you wish to go, you shall have my full permission."

Such was the convention between the friends; and for the rest of the day they talked it over, and many points arising from it, with an increasing confidence in each other. But even from this first day's unbroken intercourse, it was evident that the inevitable ascendancy to be gained by one of two minds so situated, was already inclining in Adrienne's favour. Young as she was, her inexperience was overbalanced by the natural strength and buoyancy of her character, and by the total artlessness of nature which put those qualities forth without any effort. Balmat, rough, bold, and cautious, had always an object to strain for in this intercourse. He was never quite at his ease, because never sure of himself; and his repeated projects for saying or planning something to gain influence over Adrienne, were constantly frustrated by some such abrupt remarks as I have already recorded. It may be taken as a fact, that in all such mental partnerships, the simple, straightforward intellect will be sure to take the lead, if both are on a tolerable par of equality in point of talent; and that it is not in any case a question of youth or age.

CHAPTER VII.

A fortnight passed over without any of those abrupt or startling incidents which form epochs in a life. Day after day Gabriel was sure to make his appearance, soon after sunrise, at the chalet, to quit it again at nightfall, and return home to inquire about the business of his mill, which went on in its usual slovenly and imperfect way, under the management of his men. Old Jeannette saw with wonderment the great change in her master's manner and temper. Something had evidently come over him of a bright and soothing nature, like a sudden rain that makes a path of light through a dark wood. The old woman was pleased with this; for she liked him about as much as the keepers of a menagerie may like the beasts he feeds, and coaxes and strokes with a stick. But as soon would she have dared to question the mysterious workings of Balmat's heart, as the keeper of a menagerie would hope to know what passed in the brain of his savages. Gabriel had therefore that greatest of luxuries for a mind strong enough to bear its own happiness—the pleasure of enjoying a secret, without the want of a confidant or the intrusion of a friend—as inquisitive praters are in common parlance called.

The poor Carriers did not know what to think or how to act. Their feelings on the one hand, and their "friends" on the other, were a perpetual torment to them. What with unborn anxiety and unasked for advice, they had not a moment's peace. The thousand projects self-conceived or suggested by others, thwarting each other, and all one by one abandoned, baffled every attempt at detail from any source open to my inquiries.

I confess myself curious to know what parents could do or might feel in a case like this; but, as my readers are already aware that there was no actual danger hanging over our heroine, we may pass by all inquiries as to the fears and hopes of the father and mother. One little incident arising from them must, however, be recorded.

It was on the sixteenth morning of Adrienne's voluntary exile from her home, and just as the sun, rushing up to the topmost height of heaven, burnished the snow-covered peaks into a brightness that was too dazzling for Gabriel Balmat's eyes, that he turned them for a moment round, to see that no one followed or observed him, as he took the wood-path towards Montanvert, in his usual walk to the chalet. Keen as a hawk that has its heart fixed on its prey, and its glance on the look-out for the sportsman, Gabriel caught sight of a human figure crouched behind a pine-tree, and evidently in the attitude of one that watched. He doubted not for an instant that it was his movements which were thus observed. The doer of a secret deed has always a spy in his conscience. Balmat was as cunning as he was suspicious. He therefore paused a few seconds, carefully, and then lunged into the cover, with the air of one indifferent or thoughtless. But the moment he was concealed from view, he darted suddenly through the brush-wood, round in the direction of the hidden figure; and as he gained the rear of the position, he observed a man stealthily but quickly going in the line he had himself taken a few minutes before. He was instantly on the track of his imagined follower, whom he recognised as one of the youths employed at Jean Carrier's mill. His conviction of his being watched and dogged by order of the persons he still hated so cordially, threw him into one of those fits of calm fury, so terrible in a temper like his. In a few minutes he was close behind the youth, who paused on the path, with straining looks, to discover the object he believed himself to be pursuing. In a moment more, a powerful stroke from Balmat's staff brought the stunned and terrified youth to the ground, for, as he reeled and fell, he caught a view of the bloodless face of his assailant, whose desperate look was more frightful than his upraised weapon. Another and another blow fell quick on the prostrate and now senseless body, and a few seconds would have certainly left it a corpse, had not the appearance of another person, and the loud cries for mercy which broke on Balmat's ear, arrested him for a moment in his sanguinary work.

"Oh, spare him! It was not his fault! He acted by my orders; he only did the bidding of a mother seeking to recover her child!"

As Balmat turned round and saw Madame Carrier, all the desperate passions of his nature became at once concentrated. The rage of the tiger interrupted in his horrid feast—the revenge of the savage Indian who has tracked his enemy to his last retreat—the fiercest and most deadly feelings that could stimulate a man to murder—rushed all at once upon him. He gazed for a few moments on the imploring figure of the poor woman. But he saw her indistinctly, for the film of passion was upon his eyes. A confused murmur of words was in his ears; but he did not distinguish her plaintive entreaties for mercy to the helpless victim at his feet, accompanied with appeals for news of her lost daughter.

He deliberately strode forward, and at every step he grasped his weapon with more strength, while his lips became closer compressed, his eyes more fixed, and his brow more firmly knit. The woman, now for her own sake terrified to excess, marking the fearful look which glowered on her, and the appalling calm with which Balmat raised up his arm as if to strike, sank on her knees, with lifted hands and a loud shriek, that made him start and pause. That one wild sound brought him into complete consciousness. The image of little Adrienne seemed magically interposed between him and the mother thus miraculously saved. The rigid tension of muscle and mind was all at once relaxed. His right arm dropped slowly down by his side, a ghastly smile played over his pale lips, and, quietly waving his left hand in the direction of the valley, he said, in a calm tone:

"Go home, Madame Carrier—go home! You have no reason to be alarmed! Go home!"

Like a reprieved criminal at the scaffold's foot, she could not at the first moment understand the announcement of mercy. She still maintained her kneeling posture, and her words ran on in the same tone of supplication.

"Why, you don't suppose I was going to do you any harm?" said Balmat.

"Oh, no!" replied she, recovering at once her consciousness of safety, and a cunning which prompted an avoidance of anything likely to offend him. "It was only for that poor lad that I implored your compassion! He is punished sufficiently for my fault!"

Balmat threw a scowl at the now recovering youth, who groaned and writhed from pain. He then said, in a quiet, determined way:

"Let this be a lesson to you and to him, and keep this little adventure to yourselves. If I am further troubled by you or your people, I have my revenge in my own hands, Madame Carrier!"

"Alas, I fear so!" exclaimed she; "you have us all in your power, Gabriel; do, then, be merciful—for once, she was nearly adding, but she gulped down the words—and put me out of pain with regard to Adrienne!"

"What an extraordinary woman you are!" replied he, scoffingly. "What could I know of your daughter, more than everybody knows? She has herself told you two or three times, under her hand, that she is well and happy!"

"Ah, Gabriel, you do know more than that, and perhaps even that is not true!"

"True or false, it is none of my business."

"I ask your pardon; but that you had some hand in her concealment I am now certain!"

Balmat only answered by a laugh of mockery, and then added, as he pointed to the wounded youth, who now slowly raised himself from the ground:

"You had better look to that lout, and take him away!"

He walked off into the wood with a steady and resolute air, not deigning to reply to the entreaties for a few more words, for a few minutes' delay, which the afflicted mother continued to pour out, as long as he was within hearing or sight. She was afraid to follow him, and when he disappeared she turned her attention to the young man, staunch the blood that flowed from his head, and returned with him to the mill—from whence she had stolen out unknown to her husband, a couple of hours before, to lie in wait for and watch the proceedings of the object of her suspicion, and now more than ever, of her terror also.

Balmat, in the meantime, proceeded on his devious route, turning and twisting like a frightened hare; but not so much from dread of a renewed pursuit, as from the hope of escaping from his own agitating thoughts, ere he reached the chalet, and presented himself, as usual, with an unruffled aspect to his now dear-loved prisoner. Madame Carrier was not more terrified by the expectation of Balmat's threatened violence than he was at the recollection of it, nor more rejoiced at the escape which had saved him from the commission of the crime he was within an instant of committing. The wild shriek which had recalled him to a sense of his atrocity still rang in his ears. It was like a voice from heaven, sent direct to his heart. It was like a warning of a guardian angel, to make him pause on the brink of a precipice. He shuddered at the retrospect. He felt that if he had dealt one felon blow, and killed the mother of Adrienne, he was lost beyond hope. His next step would, as it seemed to his turbid mind, have inevitably been his own destruction. Picture upon picture rose up in his imagination—one more horrid than another. His suffering was intense. At times he stood still, and, placing his hand upon his eyes, strove, as it were, to shut out those frightful images. Then he would run forward for a space, as if to fly from his pursuing thoughts. Again he flung himself on the ground, and rolled about in mental agony. At last he gained sufficient self-command to enable him to continue his path with some show of calmness. It was a fixed determination to fly altogether the scene of his suffering, and the chance of its renewal, that thus gave him a respite from despair. To scrape together all the ready money he could lay hands on—to sell his property in his house and mill—to carry off Adrienne into the depths of the mountain chain, and farther, if their retreat should be discovered—were the abrupt but positive resolutions now formed. And, having thus made up his mind, he at length felt himself in a fitting mood to approach the chalet, and in appetite for the morning repast.

During the fortnight which had just passed with all the apparent speed which monotony gives to time, Adrienne had become a perfect enthusiast. As to the nobler beauties of nature with which she was in such close communion, she was day by day more enamoured with the romantic independence of her present life. A fortnight so passed, in such sequestered solitude, with scenes like those, without care or disquietude, and with an absolute equality of enjoyment, was like a day in the computation of life. On a child of Adrienne's temperament, it was, nevertheless, sure to stamp an ineffaceable influence. The opening vigour of her character expanded with maturity, like a flower shone on by the ripening sun. Her mind seemed every hour to take in lessons of strength and purity, from the observance of nature's grand simplicity. The sunrise and sunset, the march of the moon, the regulated anarchy of heaven's starry host—the stupendous mountains, and all their tributary forms of hill, vale, stream, and cataract—worked upon the intellect of this young creature, until she felt herself as more a thing of them than of the mortal world to which she appertained. Had education been at hand, to graft its miracles of knowledge on this stem of rude enthusiasm, our little Adrienne might have become a paragon of cultivated science, instead of the heroine of a simple mountain tale.

THE MOON.—Baer, a German astronomer, calculates that when we shall have an instrument nine times more powerful than Lord Rosse's, it will bring the moon within a German mile of us, so as to show an object as small as a man.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

MAGNETO-ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—Messrs. Bright and Bright have recently patented an arrangement for the simplification and general perfection of apparatus for obtaining currents of electricity on the magneto-electric principle. In the absence of diagrams, we can give but a general description. Two electro-magnetic coils are attached to the ends of a double arm, moving freely on its centre, and are placed near the poles of a series of powerful permanent magnets. These are connected with a lever handle, having a catch and ratchet wheels, having on their peripheries a series of cogs, between each of which are inserted pieces of non-conducting substances, as ivory. On the handle being moved either to the right or left, connection between the line and the earth is broken at the spring by one or the other non-conducting plates, while the other spring catch moves over the metallic or conducting plate, thus keeping up an uninterrupted current.

DISCOVERY OF AMBER.—Pieces of amber have for some time past been found on the coast of Courland, but in such small quantity that it was hardly considered worth while to collect them. In recently cutting a canal for draining a lake near that of Anserche, on the eastern coast of Courland, between 57 deg. 10 min. and 58 deg. 20 min. of north latitude, and not far from the Gulf of Riga, pieces of amber were found, and, on the search being continued, more pieces were picked up on the banks of the Lake of Anserche itself. At first the discovery was kept secret, as the lakes belong to the crown, and the amber was secretly sold for small sums by the persons who found it. But the inhabitants of the adjacent villages gradually became acquainted with the fact, and they made a practice of going en masse on Sundays to collect the amber. The priests, annoyed at seeing the churches abandoned, made inquiries as to the cause, and, on learning it, made it known to the authorities. The quantity of amber already sold by the peasants to Jew dealers has brought them in not less than 4000 silver roubles (the rouble is 4s. 5c.); but that is considerably less than its real value. The pieces of amber are for the most part transparent, and some of them are so large that they fetch from five to six roubles. In some of the pieces winged insects have been found.

TOBACCO SEED OIL.—A British resident in Russia, who is a member of the Imperial Geographical Society of that country, and gardener to his Excellency General Vsolodsky, near Kizlior, has found, by experiment, that the seed of the tobacco plant contains about fifteen per cent. of an oil that has superior desiccative qualities, which may be employed with advantage in paints and varnishes. The process of extraction is said to be simple and easy, requiring only a reduction of the seed to powder, which is to be kneaded into a stiff paste with a sufficient quantity of hot water, and afterwards submitted to the action of a very strong press. The oil, when expressed, is exposed to a moderate heat, which, coagulating the vegetable albumen of the seed, precipitates all the impurities to the bottom of the vessel, leaving the oil in a perfectly clear and limpid state.

PRODUCTION OF OXYGEN GAS.—M. Boussingault has lately described a process by which pure oxygen gas may be obtained from the atmosphere at a trifling cost, so as to enable it to be collected in unlimited quantities and preserved in gasometers, like coal-gas, for application to many practical uses in the arts. This process depends upon a peculiar property possessed by the earth barytes, of absorbing the atmospheric oxygen at one temperature and evolving it at another; or, rather, the ready conversion of hydrate of barytes into peroxide of barium, by a current of atmospheric air at a dull red heat, and the decomposition of the peroxide, by steam, at a lower temperature, even at 212 deg. F., with re-formation of the hydrate of barytes—the process being in reality a continuous one. It is found in practice advisable to mix the barytes with hydrate of lime or magnesia, so as to prevent the fusing of the first: this mixture, when placed in an earthen tube heated to dull redness, is to be oxidised by passing a current of dry atmospheric air over it. So soon as the oxidation is completed, the tube is connected with the gas-holder, and a jet of steam allowed to act upon it: this reconverts the peroxide of barium into hydrate of barytes, the excess of oxygen being given off and collected in the gas-holder. The barytes is then again oxidised by a fresh current of air, and deoxidised by steam as frequently as required, thus making the process continuous. Mons. Boussingault considers that about 1000 cubic feet of pure oxygen gas could be obtained every twenty-four hours, by the use of 10 cwt. of barytes, which will answer this purpose for any length of time.

VENTILATION.—The only ventilation practicable in the houses of the working classes is that which is termed natural ventilation; which is caused by the ascent of heated air; the air which becomes impure by the action of the lungs, or by the burning of candles, lamps, gas, &c., or by the fire, is heated, and rendered lighter than pure air—it therefore rises to the top, and cold, pure air takes its place. Thus, to ventilate a room well, it is essential that there should be two openings: one above, by means of which the impure, heated air can pass out, and another below, for the entrance of pure, cold air. In dwelling-rooms, as ordinarily constructed, the impure air is imperfectly carried away by the draught of the chimney: it follows that the whole of the room above the level of the fire-place remains filled with air in a partially impure state; and the openings by which air is admitted are usually left to chance, the cracks around and under the doors and windows being the means by which it gains an entrance. If these are not sufficient to admit a proper quantity of air to supply the draught of the chimney, the latter necessarily smokes. A much better plan is, to admit the pure outer air by means of a plate of perforated zinc, placed, instead of a pane of glass, in the upper part of one or more of the windows farthest from the fire; the air entering through the zinc in small streams, becomes so mingled with the warm air of the room, that a draught is prevented, and when the windows are opposite the fire, the whole air of the room is gradually and imperceptibly changed. If to this mode of admitting pure, cold air, be added an opening in the chimney, near the ceiling, to allow the escape of the impure, warm air, much will be done for health and comfort; this opening in the chimney, however, requires a chimney-valve to prevent any downward draught of smoke: the utility of this mode of allowing air to enter and escape, for the purpose of ventilating rooms, is proved by its frequent and increasing adoption. Sheets of perforated zinc may be obtained from 6d. upwards, and chimney valves from 4s. to 5s. Where appearance is an object, glass perforated with circular holes or slits may be employed instead of zinc, and chimney-valves are made of a very ornamental character. Cold air, it may be added, should never be admitted under the doors or at the bottom of a room, unless it be close to the fire or stove—otherwise it flows along the floor towards the fire-place, leaving the upper foul air unchanged, and cooling most unpleasantly and injuriously the feet and legs, which are most susceptible of injury by cold.

NEW USES OF THE LEAF OF THE PINUS SYLVESTRIS.

Not far from Breslau, in Silesia, in a domain called la Prairie du Humboldt, exist two establishments, equally astonishing on account of their objects and of their connection: one is a manufactory in which the leaves of the pines are converted into a sort of cotton or wool; the other offers to the sick, as a salubrious bath, the waters left from the making of this vegetable wool. Both were founded under the head Inspector of Forests, M. de Pannewitz, the inventor of a chemical process by means of which, from the long and slim leaves of the pines, is procured a very fine filamentous substance, which has been called wood-wool (laine de bois), because it curls, felts, and may be spun like common wool.

The pinus sylvestris, or wild-pine, whence this new product is procured, is already much esteemed in Germany, on account of several valuable advantages which it presents; and, in place of abandoning it to its natural growth, extensive plantations of it have been formed, which are true forests. When planted on light and sandy soils, which it prefers, and in which it grows with the greatest rapidity, it gives them consistence and solidity. Associated with the oak, it becomes a shelter, under the shadow of which this latter acquires a great strength of development, until in its turn it rises above its protector. When the pine has reached its fortieth year, it furnishes very profitable crops of resin. Its wood is esteemed for buildings, &c. The employment which M. de Pannewitz has proposed to give to its leaves will, without doubt, contribute to spread still more the culture of a tree already so useful, and will perhaps give it some favour in other countries where it is scarcely known.

All the acicular leaves of the pines, the firs, and coniferous trees in general, are composed of a bundle of fibres extremely fine and tenuous, which are surrounded and held together by a resinous substance in thin pellicles. When by heat, and by the employment of certain chemical reagents, the resinous substance is dissolved, it is easy to separate the fibres from each other, to wash them, and to free them from all foreign bodies. According to the method used, the woolly substance acquires a finer quality, or remains in a coarser state: and in the first case it is employed as wadding; in the second, as filling for mattresses. Such, in a few words, is the account of the discovery due to M. de Pannewitz.

The first use which was made of this filamentous substance, was to substitute it for cotton wadding in quilted coverlets. In the year 1842, the hospital of Vienna bought five hundred of these coverlets, and, after using them for several years, renewed its orders. It was remarked, among other things, that, under the influence of the pine-wool, no kind of parasitic insect harboured in the bed, and the aromatic odour which they emitted was considered to be agreeable and beneficial. Soon afterwards, the penitentiary of Vienna was provided with the same kind of coverlets. Since then they have been adopted, as have been also mattresses filled with the same wool, in the hospital La Charité at Berlin, and at the hospital La Maternité, and the soldiers' quarters at Breslau. An experience of five years in these establishments has shown that the wood-wool is well fitted for use in coverlets, and for wadded goods, and is very durable.

At the end of five years, a mattress of wood-wool had cost less than one of straw, which required the addition every year of at least two pounds of fresh straw. Furniture in the construction of which this matter was used, was preserved from the attacks of moths. It cost three times less than hair, and the most skilful upholsterer could not distinguish an article of furniture in which it is used from a similar one stuffed with hair. We are besides assured that it may be spun and woven. The finest gives a thread resembling that of hemp, and is as strong. When spun, woven, and finished like cloth, it furnishes a product which may be employed for carpets, horse-furniture, &c.; when interwoven with a warp of linen, it may be used as bed coverings. The products of the manufactories of Zuckmantel and La Prairie du Humboldt gained for their present owner, M. Weiss, a bronze medal at the Exhibition of Berlin, and a silver medal at that of Altenburg.

THE DARK ARCHES UNDER CONSTANTINOPLE.

Now that the Turkish empire has manifested unequivocal signs of dissolution, seeing that its feeble authority has been upheld solely by the armed intervention of those western powers it once bearded and set at defiance, it would be as well—before indulging in sentimental regrets over its decay and final extinction in Europe—to study Turkish history, and endeavour to form a satisfactory opinion of the causes that have brought the once haughty Moslem to the humiliating necessity of suing for the protection of France and England.

Any one acquainted with the condition of the Greek empire after the fall of Rome, will at once be enabled to see that the rise of the Turks was casual. They were indebted for their greatness to three leading causes—the debased and fallen state of the eastern empire, the mutual animosities of the Greeks and Latins, and the decided superiority of the Turks over the bickering and degenerate nations of Christendom. The chief engine of their success was their military system, which, in point both of discipline and skill, was far superior to the tactics of Christian Europe.

In those ages war was the sole arbiter of the destinies of nations; and it is curious to observe that, as in earlier periods, the military science of the Greeks and the numerous armies of Persia had been forced to yield to the compact pressure of the Macedonian phalanx, and the phalanx in its turn was vanquished by the legion, so did the heroic but desultory system of warfare which succeeded the abolition of the Roman, yield to the enthusiastic discipline and headlong charges of those Turkish hordes who had crossed the Bosphorus, and overrun Europe to the borders of modern Germany. So that the Turkish empire, in its origin, was essentially an empire of the sword—and therefore could not possibly endure. Founded on decay, its vitality also decayed when Europe rose like a giant—strong and ardent, after a protracted slumber—and changed the aspect of the world.

The character of the Turks affords us a significant clue to their decline as a nation. The temperament of the Turk is phlegmatic—he is disposed to quiescence and indolence; but, under the influence of powerful excitements, he passes from a state of insensibility into the most unrestrained violence and excess. This habitual sedateness and inertness, in combination with a latent energy, may serve to explain some of the inconsistencies in the national character and history.

The Turk is habitually temperate—he never tastes the forbidden juice—but he can “get as drunk as a Christian lord.” He is mild and grave, but when provoked he is infuriated. He has little fanaticism—but when his religious fervour is kindled, it becomes a brutal frenzy. He is not habitually cruel—he is sometimes generous and humane; but he is of all men the most remorseless in his cruelty. He will not luxuriate in the agonies of an enemy, and trample upon his victim—he has little taste for the more exquisite refinements of revenge: in this respect he displays more of the demon in his worst excesses, than either Frank or Greek. But then he butchers with less compunction, and with a more entire contempt for human life; his eye never pities, and his heart never bleeds. Age or sex excites no commiseration in him, who, on slight provocation, or from policy, dooms the wife of his bosom to the death of a cat, and his children to the bow-string. The same insensibility to the higher attributes of human nature displays itself in the smooth-faced perfidy with which he can inveigle, in order to destroy, his unsuspecting victim—perhaps his old associate or guest. In fact, alike in his pleasures and his cruelties, the Turk is an impassible animal—coldly voluptuous, and coldly cruel; deliberate alike in good and evil, less to be dreaded when choleric than when concealing his emotions, not intolerant—far less so, as a Moslem, than either Greek or Latin; not ungrateful, not inhospitable, not unkind to his dependents, not incapable of generosity; but naturally arrogant, sensual, and implacable—knowing no medium between the despot and the slave—too generally a hypocrite in all things—so much so as to please the Frank, whom he despises,—in a word, exhibiting more or less the deadening and debasing effects of a despotic government, oriental prejudices, and a pharisaical and sensual creed.

The decline and fall of a people so constituted was inevitable. They had nothing to oppose to adverse circumstances beyond their control. Among these we may mention, that the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope and a new route to India, was one of not the least influential causes of the decline of the Turkish monarchy. Previously to that discovery, the Venetians had formed establishments in the ports of Syria and Egypt, and had obtained the grant of various commercial privileges from the Mamelukes, which were confirmed by Selim I. To these ports the valuable commodities of China and India would have continued to be brought, or would have found their way overland to those of the Black Sea, and thence by a short navigation to Constantinople, had not a new channel been opened for that commerce, which in every age has been the richest source of mercantile wealth and greatness. About the year 1620, the voyages to the East Indies by the new route are stated to have lowered so considerably the prices of Indian merchandise, that the trade between India and Turkey, by the Persian Gulf and Red Sea, having much decayed, the Grand Seigniors were greatly lessened. The decay of the empire then commenced, and the importance of Turkey in the political system of Europe was thenceforth greatly diminished.

When Russia, as appears inevitable, marches to the gates of Constantinople, the struggle will be fierce and protracted. Under the banner of the Prophet, the Turks will fight valiantly; they will oppose the fiercest fanaticism to the discipline of a foe as skillful as rugged. And who can doubt the result? However, should the enemy approach Constantinople, that city might be defended to an indefinite period—that is, supposing the fleets of France and England kept the communications by sea open and uninterrupted—for the walls of Constantinople are considered very good: those on the land side have a double range, twenty feet from each other, and are defended by a flat-bottomed ditch, some twenty-five feet broad. The outer wall, which is about twelve feet high, is defended by two hundred and fifty strong towers; the inner wall is above twenty feet high, with towers similar to those of the outer. Military strategists consider that if all these points were well fortified, and the sea approaches kept clear of the enemy, Constantinople might be defended against any force which the power of Russia could bring against it. But supposing the city was reduced to the last extremity, it might still be desperately defended. The population would be destroyed, but the military could hold out until famine swept them away. For the storage of provisions, the wonderful vaults of Constantinople supply ample convenience. One of them affords abundance of pure fresh water—in fact, it is a subterranean reservoir.

These vast under-ground edifices rank among the most remarkable monuments of old Constantinople. They were built by the Greeks as cisterns, and were always kept full, in case of siege. Through the neglect of the Turks, many of them are much decayed, and some are wholly blocked up, so that their positions are unknown. There is one vault, called “the palace of the thousand and one pillars,” which the Turks allow strangers to inspect. The entrance to it is from the centre of the city, down a narrow but substantial and well-preserved stone staircase. Instead of being a cistern filled with an immense body of water, it is occupied as a silk factory. It is about thirty feet deep, and the roof is about six feet from the surface of the street. This vault extends over about an acre of ground. But the greatest curiosity is the vault which still exists as a cistern. This vault the Turks guard with the greatest jealousy; very few, even of those who live above it, being aware of its precise locality. It is a subterranean lake, extending under many streets, and the former has an arched roof, supported by three hundred and thirty-six pillars of solid marble. An English gentleman, who was fortunate enough to obtain access to it, has supplied us with a very animated description of its appearance. He says:

“Having learned that there was a Greek reservoir in the city, in good preservation, and still partially full of water, I made many inquiries respecting it, but all in vain. At length, meeting a friend whose long residence in Constantinople had afforded him the means of knowing more than I could do about it, I asked him if the account of the existence of the reservoir was correct:

“Perfectly so,” said he; “though I never have seen it.” Expressing an earnest wish to behold it, he told me that, with a large bribe, he thought he could obtain me permission—for he was acquainted with an old Turk, whose house was said to cover one of the openings into it. I readily agreed to give the required douceur, and he arranged to call next morning, if successful. The following morning, my friend came with the news of his success. After passing through several streets, we reached the upper part of the city, and entered an old-looking house. We were received by an aged Turk, with a venerable beard, whose dress betokened neither very great wealth, nor very great cleanliness. After being invited to take coffee and a pipe, which we accepted—my friend serving as interpreter to the few words of conversation that passed between us—our host informed us he was ready to show us the way to the subterranean palace.

“We proceeded to the inner court of the house, and, turning sharp to the right, were ushered into a small room, the floor of which was a few steps below the surface of the ground. Here the guide provided two torches, and, putting one into my hands, and carrying the other himself, proceeded to raise a sort of trap-door, and, bidding us follow him, began to descend. My friend immediately stepped down after him, and I brought up the rear. After descending thirty steps, or more, of a strong stone staircase, we felt sure, from the cold dampness of the air, that we were in the immediate vicinity of water. Our surmises were soon verified, by the Turk (who was a step or two lower than either of us) calling to my friend to take his torch, while he unmoored a light boat that was fastened to the winding staircase. A step or two lower, and amid innumerable columns, rising on every hand, we discerned the water gleaming under the light of our torches.

“We were soon seated in the boat, and the Turk, equipping himself with a small pair of sculls, shoved us off. The splash of the chain that had moored the boat, as it fell heavily into the water, echoed throughout the vaulted cavern. I shall never forget the feeling of bewilderment that for the few first minutes crept over me. Rows of marble columns seemed to rise endlessly, while their polished surfaces glistened in the torch-light. The Eastern dress of our guide, his flowing beard, the dismal silence of this strange place, unbroken, save by the padding of the boat, and the gleaming of our unearthly lights, made me think of the poet’s description of the Stygian ferryman. After a time I began to look round more attentively. The columns are of marble; many of them with Corinthian capitals, though we saw some of the Composite, and others of the Doric order. Some retained all the sharpness of their exquisite finish, while others seemed to be undergoing dilapidation from the hand of Time.

“They appeared to me to be the spoils of more than one temple, appropriated by imperial builders to this use. We looked for an inscription, but could nowhere find one. The roof seemed in excellent condition, and appeared to be fifteen or twenty feet above the surface of the water. Unlike most other guides, ours was by no means communicative, and only by dint of questioning him could we learn anything from him. He said, “the water was unfathomable, and it was as it always had been.” I am of opinion there was from twelve to fifteen feet depth of water in the cistern. It extends under several streets, and, from the darkness and gloom which envelope it, its area seems of great extent. It may well be called a lake. After paddling to one extremity, which we found to consist of a wall faced with blocks of marble, and reaching nearly across it in the opposite direction, our guide, in spite of all our entreaty, determined to ascend. We could learn nothing of the mode by which the water finds entrance; most likely by some underground course, and obtains egress in a similar manner. We at length reached the staircase, and, much against our will, were compelled to leave this wonderful cistern, which we would gladly still further have explored.”

The reluctance of the Turks to allow these underground reservoirs to be explored, probably arises from the fact, that if their courses were known they would disclose many entrances to the city, and so facilitate the admission of a foe. Another reason may be given. The Turks are excessively superstitious. They believe in ghosts, goblins, and demons, and fancy that the powers of darkness and destruction take up their abode in places like these subterranean retreats. The traditions of the cruelties perpetrated on the Greeks in these artificial caverns have not yet died away; and when we add, that these excavations have been used by the Turks for the most detestable purposes, we shall be at no loss to account for the rigid reserve they maintain upon the subject. They have served the purposes of revenge, intrigue, and political necessity. The father of the present sultan once found the one given in our illustration very useful.

Selim had been dethroned and imprisoned by the Janissaries, and Mustapha IV. reigned in his stead. This arrangement did not at all suit Baractier—a general who marched to Constantinople at the head of forty thousand men. Having obtained possession of the capital, he hastened to the seraglio—but found the gates closed, and every preparation made for a determined defence. The general, disappointed, but not intimidated, gave orders for an immediate assault. The contest lasted only a short time, but the interval was fatal to Selim. On the sound of the first shot, the emissaries of the sultan were dispatched to the apartments of Selim—whom, notwithstanding he was at his devotions, they strangled. From the murder of Selim, the executioners proceeded to the apartments of Mahmoud, the youngest son of Abdulhamid, and the only remaining prince of the blood-royal. There was still some hope for the sultan, in the eventual death of his brother. Selim was no more: the audacious Baractier himself would respect the last of the Ottoman race. The mutes rushed into the chamber of the confined prince—but he was nowhere to be found. To the fond fidelity of a slave he was indebted for his life. At the moment that Baractier had rushed into the palace, Mahmoud, who had first been concealed in the furnace of a bath, guided by the slave, was cautiously threading some subterranean passages, until they gained an opening or recess in the wall, from which opened a door that concealed a flight of steps. The slave had brought a torch with him, and as he held it aloft, the future sultan gazed in some trepidation on a mass of darkly flowing water.

“Whither wouldst thou conduct me?” he demanded. “To life and a throne!” answered the slave, decisively. “These waters flow under the streets of Constantinople, and run from the harbour of Perami to the Sea of Marmora. Behold the means of safety I have provided!”

The prince, on looking down, beheld a small boat; and as he saw no other chance of escape, he stepped into it, followed by his faithful slave, who had previously taken the precaution to close the door on the landing. After rowing about for a few minutes, the prince endeavoured to pierce the gloom by which he was surrounded; but the feeble rays of the torch only enabled him to gaze in wonder at the massive and beautiful pillars that supported the cave, and which the slave dexterously avoided. The dull splashing of the water, the Stygian darkness, and his own peculiar position, would have weighed down the spirits of any but a Turk; but, falling back for relief on the hereditary fatalism of his race, he sat calmly in the stern of the boat, fully prepared for whatever might happen to him. Suddenly the quick ears of the slave caught the sound of oars, and, exclaiming, “We are pursued!” he dashed the torch overboard, and pulled with redoubled energy.

The sound of the other oars became louder, and on the prince looking behind him, he could plainly perceive a boat in their wake, with a torch in the bows. The slave, whose eye-sight was as keen as his hearing, relaxed in his exertions, and, letting the boat become stationary between two pillars, said:

“It is a woman and a man—we are two; let them pass!”

“An intrigue!” thought the prince, as he eagerly prepared to catch a glimpse of the fair one’s countenance. Nearer and nearer came the boat, until it approached the pillars; and the prince, with mingled admiration and surprise, saw that the lady—who was unveiled—was not only young, but supremely beautiful. Her companion was a tall, handsome-looking man, in the garb of a Turk; but his fair complexion betrayed a different origin. The light revealed the boat containing the slave and prince. The lady uttered a shriek, and quickly hid her face. Her companion, although rather surprised, undauntedly cried out, in excellent Turkish, but with a foreign accent:

“Holloa! Who’s there? Friend or foe?”

“I am Mahmoud the unfortunate!” said the prince proudly.

The Frank—for such we must call him—doffed his turban, and, making a profound inclination, said:

"No longer unfortunate—but great! An hour ago, the cannon from the seraglio announced to the people the dethronement of your predecessor, and the elevation of your sublime highness to the throne!"

"Allah be praised!" said Mahmoud, sententially. "But who art thou? Who hast thou for a companion? Speak freely—for thy good news inclines me to be generous!"

The Frank briefly told his tale—it was one of love; and his companion was a Christian girl, the daughter of a Greek merchant. She Sultan was satisfied, and the whole party returned together to the palace, where, as the Frank had stated, Mahmoud had been proclaimed sultan, and was being searched for everywhere. But it behoves us to describe the adventures of the Frank with some moderate verbosity.

In the Fanar quarter of Constantinople there dwelt a rich Greek. His gardens extended to the water's edge, but his mansion, externally, was mean enough to avoid exciting the cupidity of the Turks. Constantine Mavrocordato enjoyed, among his own countrymen, the reputation of being a miser and enormously wealthy. He had only one child—a daughter—whose sole companion was an ugly old negress. Now, Vakeen was an obedient child, but her father's idolatry of money had never induced him to win her affections. Added to this, Vakeen suspected her father of one of the foulest crimes—murder. She had observed many people enter the house who never left it, or were ever seen again. One day a stranger called, and she determined to watch, and if possible ascertain whether her suspicions were well founded. He never left the house; but at midnight, hearing a shuffling noise in her father's apartments, she stole out of her room, and, hiding herself behind an angle in the corridor, beheld, to her horror, her only parent dragging something heavy in a sack, along the floor. The outlines were those of a human being. Constantine, panting with the exertion, pulled his load to a door which his daughter had never seen opened before, but which was then wide open, and she could see some steps leading from it.

Determined to penetrate the mystery of her father's movements, as soon as he had disappeared down the steps with his burthen, she followed, and, peering after him, she could see nothing, but heard a sullen splash in some water, and her father mutter:

"The dark arches, like the sea, never yield up their dead!"

Vakeen saw nor heard no more—for, like a wounded bird, she flew to her chamber: and from that day the last remains of her filial affection disappeared. She could not love a murderer. A few days after this tragedy, Vakeen was seated in the garden, on a velvet cushion, holding in her left hand an ornamented pipe, with a tube of Persian cherry, and in her right, in a small stand of flagree gold, a porcelain cup, which the negress from time to time supplied with delicious mocha. Vakeen was an extremely beautiful girl of seventeen years of age. Her profile was pure Grecian. Her hair, black as the raven's wing, was parted over her temples, and, together with her large, dark eyes, served to bring out in matchless tints her clear complexion, and finely-curved carnation lips.

As she sat drinking her coffee, she formed a perfect picture of indolence and beauty. While thus employed and busied with melancholy thoughts, a shriek from the negress caused her to look up and immediately start to her feet with a crimsoned brow and haughty glance. A man had obtained access to the garden, which, in Turkey, even among the Greeks, is considered a flagrant breach of etiquette. He was not, however, calculated very much to alarm a Greek girl. Tall, robust, and handsome, he looked remarkably well in his Greek costume. But his fair complexion, light-blue eyes, and bold step, told of a more northern clime than Turkey. As he approached the agitated young girl, he said, apologetically:

"I expected to find my good friend Mavrocordato, and I behold—his—"

"Daughter," said Vakeen, blushing—for the glance of the stranger was ardent and admiring. After several common-place inquiries, he withdrew—not, however, without casting many a look behind him.

"A deuced fine girl!" he muttered to himself, in English; "too good for this country! And I dare say her old skindint of a father intends her for the Grand Sultan! Ah, after all, England's the place for a woman!"

"Fine man!" said the negress to her mistress. "He walks like a great warrior I have often seen in my own dear country!"

Vakeen did not reply, but walked into the house abstractedly. The next morning found her on the same spot; and by a coincidence the stranger came also, and her father was not at home. Her reserve thawed under his genial manner and winning smiles—his handsome, manly figure and looks were amazingly effective—and she allowed him to say something complimentary. The next day, and the next—indeed every day for a whole week—the stranger and she met on the same spot; and it is but fair to say that each was speedily heart-deep in love with the other. On the seventh day her father abruptly informed her that he had destined her to be the spouse of a rich effendi. He forgot to add that he had sold her for a large consideration. Vakeen was in despair. The next day, however, a revolution broke out in Constantinople; and, amid the roar of artillery, the crash of musketry, and the awful conflagrations raging in the city, Mussulman mobs began to pillage the Greeks. A villainous lot of unwashed Turks assailed the house of the old miser. He was not at home, but his daughter was; and while the yells and shrieks of the mob rang in her ears, she lay sobbing in the arms of her English lover. Death stared both in the face; and, as the Englishmen prepared for a desperate defence, suddenly Vakeen recollected the door of the secret flight of steps. The negress, who had long before known of its existence, produced a key; and, leading the way with a torch, they were speedily in a boat, and cleaving the waters under Constantinople at a very rapid rate.

We have related the encounter with Mahmoud, and have only to add, that Vakeen and her Frank lover were married, and after a short residence in England they returned to the East, where John Stanley had agreed to take service with Mahmoud, as a superintendent in one of the departments of the navy of the Sublime Porte.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER L.

Murder—not justice—is their secret aim.—CREON.

LEICESTER and Burleigh, the undisguised enemies of the unfortunate Duke of Norfolk, were determined upon his destruction; and Elizabeth, who was well aware of their vindictive feelings, used them as blinds in the eyes of the world, for her cruelty in consenting to the death of so near a relative. At their instigation, parliament voted an address to the queen, praying her to consider the state of the nation, whose welfare was inseparable from personal safety, and demanding that justice might be dealt upon the mighty traitor, as they affected to call him.

After this address we hear of no more coquetting—no more hesitations: the order for the duke's death was signed, and the execution took place on the 2nd of June, 1572.

At the same time the obsequious parliament voted the address which consigned the premier peer of England to the block, it passed two bills: the first inflicted the punishment of death upon the unfortunate Mary, for her supposed share in the plot of Rodolfi; the second made it high treason in any one to assert the rights of the captive princess to succeed to the crown of England.

Elizabeth, who at that time was plotting the assassination of Mary, refused her assent.

The negotiations for her marriage with the Duc D'Alençon were still going on, when an event occurred which rendered the match decidedly unpopular in England: this was the massacre of St. Bartholomew, which aimed at nothing less than the destruction of the Protestants throughout the entire kingdom of France.

In England the intelligence was received with astonishment and horror: so much so, that the very name of a Frenchman was held in execration by the people. At the first audience which Elizabeth granted the ambassador, La Motte, after the perpetration of the disgraceful tragedy, she appeared in the deepest mourning, surrounded by her council, the highest nobility of her realm, and the ladies of her court. In a stern voice, she demanded if the horrible intelligence she had heard was true.

The ambassador endeavoured to vindicate the honour of his master, by stating that he had been driven to the course he had pursued by the treasonable conspiracies of the Protestants throughout his kingdom; but that his orders had been misunderstood and exceeded, and that no one more than the King of France regretted the accident.

In order to divert Elizabeth from dwelling upon the subject, the cunning Frenchman, who knew her vanity and weakness, presented her with a love-letter from the Duc D'Alençon, which, he states, in his despatches to his own court, her majesty received and read with infinite satisfaction and contentment.

But the lords of her council were far more difficult to be convinced that the massacre had, in fact, been the result of accident: they declared it to be the most enormous crime which had been perpetrated since the death of the Saviour of the world.

It is sickening to think that the manoeuvring and conduct of Elizabeth on this occasion was but the result of refined hypocrisy. The great Protestant queen, at the very time she publicly expressed her horror and indignation at the court of France, was in friendly correspondence with the infamous Catherine De Medicis, who planned the massacre of St. Bartholomew: the subject being neither more nor less than the means of eradicating from the features the scars left by the ravages of the small-pox.

It has frequently been observed that one crime serves as the excuse and justification of another. The Protestants of England, who were naturally indignant at the fate of their brethren in France, began to call for the blood of the Queen of Scots; and Sandys, Bishop of London, drew eternal infamy upon himself, by writing a memorial to Burleigh, which commenced with the following horrible piece of advice—horrible from any man, but most especially so, coming from a minister of the God of mercy.

It began: "Forthwith cut off the Scottish queen's head!" The entire epistle will be found in "Ellis's Royal Letters," second series, vol. iii.

As yet, Elizabeth shrank from shedding the blood of her royal kinswoman, who was fully justified in using every means short of assassination to effect her escape from the hard captivity in which she was detained. That this hesitation arose from no compunctious visitings of conscience, the inveterate malice with which she pursued her unfortunate rival, and the judicial murder of her, sufficiently proves she sought to effect her purpose by ways equally infamous and cruel.

She proposed to deliver Mary into the hands of the Earl of Morton and the Scottish Regent, Mar, to be dealt with for her crimes—stipulating that she should be put to death within a few hours after trial; that, whether they tried her or not, she should die; and, as a guarantee for the murder which she feared to commit herself, the children of the Scottish lords should be placed in her hands.

This treaty failed through the avarice of the queen, who declined paying the yearly pensions which the northern lords demanded as the price of their compliance.

Burleigh and Leicester, the prime agents in this horrible scheme, were shortly afterwards exposed to the greatest alarm. Elizabeth caught the small-pox, and for some days her life was considered in danger. Had the sceptre passed from her hand to that of Mary, how different a page would have been written in the annals of England; but it was not to be: the queen slowly recovered, and the captive Mary, instead of ascending a throne, was reserved by her persecutors to mount a scaffold.

Shortly after her recovery, the treaty of marriage with the Duc D'Alençon was resumed. So perfect was her reconciliation with Catherine De Medicis and the French King, that she sent the Earl of Worcester as her ambassador to Paris, to represent her at the christening of the French princess, and refused all further assistance to the Protestants who still held out in Rochelle.

For the amusement of our female readers, we subjoin the following love-letter, written by the royal suitor. The original is preserved in the Bodleian Library, at Oxford:

"Madame,

"Whatsoever I have seen or heard of the declaration you have made, of your good affection towards our marriage, has given me extreme pleasure and contentment; and also, that it has pleased you to plan an interview between you and I, which is a thing that I have so much at heart, that I can think of nothing but to do all that may be possible for me to enjoy, instantly, this satisfaction, as I have had, for a length of time, the wish of offering very humble and agreeable service, in order to participate in your good graces: of this I have always assured you by my letters, but I desire to confirm it to you by word of mouth, if it be the will of God that this interview should take place, the which I hope will be in such a manner, and so favourable, that it will not pass over without the utmost pleasure to us both, as well as an advancement that will lead this negotiation to a good conclusion. The Sieur de la Motte Fénélon, ambassador of the king, my lord and brother, resident near you, has charge to inform you of some particular matters: to him I remit them.

"I will not make this letter longer than to say, that I kiss your hands very humbly, and to pray God, madame, that he will have you in his holy keeping.

"From St. Germain en Laye, the xx. of Februry.

"Your very obedient brother, to do you service,

"FRANÇOIS."

There is little doubt that the only real obstacle to her marriage was her fondness for Leicester, although she repeatedly declared to the ambassador of France that she would never bestow her hand upon one of her own subjects. This fondness was so apparent, and displayed in so public and indelicate a manner, that the scandalous chronicles of the time—even the diplomatic letters—are full of it. Certain it is that history has very grave reasons to doubt the purity of the maiden queen.

Although Elizabeth was avaricious in the extreme, yet in one year she bestowed upon her favourite gifts to the amount of fifty thousand pounds: the earl, in return, invited her majesty to his splendid Castle of Kenilworth, where she was lodged, together with forty earls, seventy noblemen of inferior degree, as well as the principal ladies of her court.

The admirable description which Sir Walter Scott has given us, in his fascinating novel of "Kenilworth," would render it presumptuous to attempt a description by an inferior hand. It is sufficient to state, that mythology was ransacked for devices in her honour—the elements were made to offer her tribute—and her majesty was further amused with bear-baiting, and equally barbarous sports.

From the revels and delights of Kenilworth, Elizabeth was soon compelled to return to London, by the state of her affairs. The Netherlands—or at least a portion of them—had succeeded in throwing off the yoke of Spain. But, alarmed at the cruelties of Alva, they sent a deputation to England, to offer the sovereignty of their country to the great Protestant queen, whom they looked up to as their natural protectress. Elizabeth, although she prudently declined the offer, concluded a treaty with them, by which she bound herself to assist them by a loan of one hundred thousand pounds—besides a body of six thousand men.

Thus were the seeds of war sown between England and the then powerful monarchy of Spain.

In this treaty, Elizabeth not only acted prudently, but nobly. The persecutions of Alva, in the Low Countries—the horrible cruelties he inflicted on the people, for presuming to worship God after the dictates of their own hearts—must call forth the reprobation of every honest and enlightened mind, no matter of what creed or country. In supporting the Protestants abroad, she strengthened the reformed church at home, and carried division and civil war into the dominions of her enemies. Well would it have been for her reputation as a politician, if all the foreign wars and intrigues she entered into had been based on motives equally honourable and just.

Whilst on the subject of royal progresses, we shall speedily have to record one through the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, which was made with great splendour by the maiden queen. Fortunately, ample details have descended, and they convey a seriously interesting picture of the manners of the times.

That these progresses were looked upon in the light of a burthen, rather than an honour, by the unfortunate nobility who were compelled to entertain their sovereign, sufficient proof remains in the correspondence of the times now extant. The Earl of Bedford, the ancestor of the present Duke, writing to Lord Burleigh, begs that he will contrive that her Majesty does not tarry more than two nights and a day with him. Rather an ungracious request, when it is remembered that the great wealth of the Russells was obtained from the plunder of the church, at the time of the reformation. The magnificence of this great family at the present day is owing to the increased value of the church lands, many of which belonged to the poor and old.

Neither Henry VIII. nor his successors acquired honour from the manner in which they distributed the enormous possessions of the Catholic Church.

CHAPTER LL

The citizens do ope their greasy throats,
And shout for joy—the streets are lined
With faces.

OLD PLAY.

In her progress to Norwich, Elizabeth was received by a splendid array of Suffolk gentlemen, to the number of many hundreds—all clad in white velvet, out of compliment to their maiden sovereign—who conducted her through their county with great honour—her majesty reposing on the way at the seats of Sir Thomas Cullum, and others of the nobility and gentry, where she passed several days.

On reaching the borders of Norfolk, her guard of honour resigned her majesty to the care of the gentlemen of that county, who had formed a similar array. These conducted her as far as Braknash, at which place she arrived early in the month of August.

A great crowd was gathered at Harford Bridge, which forms the eastern boundary of the city, in expectation of the arrival of her majesty. In a space formed by the city guard, were placed the mayor and aldermen, in their gowns and chains. All looked extremely happy, save the former, who had undertaken to deliver a Latin oration, welcoming the queen to the ancient capital of the East Angles, and offering her, in the name of the city, a silver cup and cover, containing a hundred pounds in gold: no inconsiderable gift in those days, even for a wealthy place like Norwich.

The sun was shining brightly, and his burning rays did not tend to increase the comfort of the distressed magistrate, who, in addition to his mental anxiety, had to support the weight not only of his robes, but of a great silver mace, which he was to present to the queen, in token of her sovereignty over the city.

At the approach of Elizabeth, who appeared escorted by a gallant train, the mayor made his speech, and concluded by presenting the cup and cover, which the queen graciously accepted—observing to the servitor who took it, that it contained a hundred pounds. Perhaps she shrewdly suspected that the fellow had not understood his worship's Latin.

Amidst the pageants with which her majesty was greeted at almost every turn, the one most worth commemorating was the strangers' pageant, got up by the Flemish weavers—a colony founded first by Queen Philippa.

It consisted of a stage with seven looms, worked by female spinning weavers and knitters. A boy recited the following verses:

From combed wool we draw this slender thread,
From thence the looms have dealing with the same;
And thence again, in order, do proceed
These several works, which skillful art doth frame;
And all to drive Dame Need into her cave,
Our heads and hands together laboured have.
We bought before, the things that now we sell,
These slender imps, their work doth pass the waves.
God's peace and thine we hold, and prosper well,
Of every mouth, the hands, the charges saves.
Thus, through thy help and aid of power Divine,
Doth Norwich live, whose hearts and goods are thine.

After listening to a second recitation, and witnessing a pageant in the market-place, Elizabeth, surrounded by the notables of the city, reached the cathedral founded by Bishop Herbert De Lozinga, who was chancellor to William the Conqueror: where she heard a Te Deum, and then retired to the bishop's palace, where she rested during her stay, which was daily marked by some festivity.

One day she hunted at Otterring, the seat of the Jeringham family—the same who had been such warm partisans of her sister Mary; another time she dined with the Earl of Surrey, the heir of the Duke of Norfolk, whom she had so cruelly beheaded.

A curious pageant of water-nymphs, who were made to rise from a hole dug by the river side, covered with canvas, to represent water, was spoiled by a sudden storm, which nearly drowned the boys who represented the aquatic deities.

From Norwich, Elizabeth proceeded to Kimberly, the seat of Sir Roger Woodhouse. Well pleased with the entertainment she had received, it is recorded that, after she had passed the city gates, she turned round, with tears standing in her eyes, waving her riding-stick in token of adieu, and exclaimed
"Farewell Norwich!"

Wearied by her procrastination, the French court, through its ambassador, at last demanded a formal reply to the offer of the hand of the Duc D'Alençon, who had now taken the title of Duc D'Anjou, in consequence of his brother, Elizabeth's refractory suitor, having succeeded to the crown.

Her majesty replied, that she could never decide on marrying one whom she had never seen. Upon this hint the royal wooer came to England, in order to urge his suit in person; and, although little and not handsome, his graceful address and gallantry made such an impression on the susceptible heart of the royal spinster, that she at once made up her mind to the match, and referred the subject to her council.

The debates which ensued were long and stormy: some advocated the marriage, out of compliance to the well-known wish of the queen—amongst others, Burleigh and Leicester; others contended that her majesty was too old to have any reasonable hope of issue.

After seven days spent in deliberation, they proceeded to Hampton Court, to wait upon their sovereign, and receive her commands upon the matter.

Elizabeth, who heard the results of their deliberation with anger and impatience, burst into a flood of tears. She had expected a petition from the lords of her council to marry, and so end all dispute as to the succession. The form of respect under which they conveyed to her the judgment they had come to on the subject, humbled and mortified her exceedingly.

"What!" she exclaimed, "is this your loyalty and faith? Would it not be better for my kingdom that I should have issue to succeed me? I was a fool," she added, "for trusting to such men! Henceforth I'll take the affair into my own hands, and decide without you!"

It was in vain that Burleigh and Leicester tried to soothe her into a more gracious mood. The disappointed spinster was not to be consoled. The latter, since his marriage with the Countess of Essex, had lost much of his influence. His royal mistress, on the discovery of the alliance he had entered into, was so enraged, that it was with the greatest difficulty she could be persuaded not to send him a prisoner to the Tower.

Although she issued a proclamation, commanding that the subject of her marriage should neither be preached nor commented upon by her subjects, yet the impression the rumour made was highly unfavourable to the popularity which Elizabeth had hitherto enjoyed. Her cruel persecution of Mary was used as an argument against her.

"What!" men argued, "shall the heiress of the crown be held a prisoner, and declared incapable of ascending, because she is Catholic; and yet the queen wed with one of the French princes—the persecutors of our faith?"

In this dilemma, the gallant Sir Philip Sidney wrote a letter, at the request of his royal mistress, who desired his opinion on the subject of her people's discontent. The reply was worthy his high and noble character, as well as the confidence reposed in him:

"Think, madam," he says, "how the hearts of your people will be galled, if not aliened, when they shall see you take a husband—a Frenchman and a Papist—in whom the very common people know this, that he is the son of the Jezebel of our age—that his brother made oblation of his own sister's marriage, the easier to make massacre of our brethren in religion! As long as he is Monsieur in might, and a Papist in profession, he neither can nor will greatly shield you; and if he grow to be king, his defence will be like Ajax' shield, which rather weighed down than defended those that bare it!"

Although the maiden majesty of England respected the honest candour of the writer, who was one of the most accomplished gentlemen of his time, her anger knew no bounds when a bencher of Lincoln's Inn presumed to publish a book against the marriage. It bore the following title:

"The Discovery of a Gaping Gulf; wherein England is likely to be Swallowed by another French Marriage; if the Lord Forbid not the Banns."

The luckless writer was condemned to lose his right hand, which was struck off with a butcher's cleaver, at Westminster. As it fell, he raised his hat with his left, and cried:

"God save Queen Elizabeth!"

The next moment he fainted.

Elizabeth, who was already turned forty-six, perpetrated this piece of cruelty to avenge the bitter disappointment she endured at not being permitted to marry a boy young enough to be her son.

ESSAYS.

No. CXCVI.—THE OLD AND NEW CRUSADES.

THE cross is marching, and will always march, until it has accomplished its mission. For eighteen centuries and a half it has been marching: first eastward, then westward, and afterwards made a grand march northward. Now it is marching southward, and mighty revolutions are pending in the theatre of the warlike glories of ancient Greece and old Rome. The new crusades are beginning to develop themselves. Already they show a firm, extended front. A new empire and a new people form the vanguard, but other powers cannot fail to be evoked to join in this third grand march on the subjugated territories of early, and at one time splendid Christendom.

The cause, the foe, and the pretexts are the same; after the lapse of seven centuries and a half, the Moslem and the Christian have the same quarrel to adjust—the same stupendous wrongs to redress. The subject is, therefore, the distinguishing one of the age, and, viewed in all its complicated aspects, the most menacing—because in its solution are interwoven consequences of the greatest magnitude and most sacred importance, not only to scores of generations of the human family, but even to the limited future of the present. We propose, then, to glance at a few of its antecedents, and indulge in some speculations upon its present and future prospects.

The material church established by that extraordinary man, Mahomet, spread with an activity that has scarcely a parallel in history. In one century it undid, in the fairest regions of the earth, what it had taken the Eastern Church to build up in six centuries. First of all, the Christians in Arabia were exterminated—then the armies of the Caliphs, after wresting from Persia the dominion of the surrounding nations, subjugated Syria and Egypt, and at length planted their standard before the gates of the city of Jerusalem. The Caliph Omar, in 636, decided the fate of the renowned Hebrew city, and erected a mosque on the sacred hill on which the Temple of Solomon had once stood in all its imposing majesty.

Here began the quarrel between the churches of Christ and Mahomet. The desecration of the Holy City was a stab in the heart of the Eastern Church; and, as it was for a time—it proved a very long time—handed over the development of the religion of charity, love, hope, and eternal salvation to the Church of the West—which, in its earlier days, it must be admitted, gloriously performed its appointed duty. Had it not been for the enthusiasm, the devotion, and the faith kindled by the zeal of the Latin Church, Western Europe must unquestionably have been overrun by the Mahomedan, and Christianity must have retired to remote fastnesses, to linger in cold exile, until the star of the East should have once more glimmered over Europe. The battle of Christianity was bravely sustained on the banks of the Danube; and as we are too prone to declaim against the evil deeds of the Church of Rome, let us, out of common sense and gratitude, remember the good deeds she contributed to bring about, in days of great need, and desolation, and midnight darkness.

After the fall of Jerusalem, the prestige of the Greek Church had vanished; and it is astonishing, at this distant time, to observe the rapidity with which the doctrines of Mahomet spread. In the next three centuries and a half they had been accepted by Persia, had penetrated as far as India, invaded Africa, been established in Sicily and Spain, and savagely threatened Constantinople itself.

But here it must be remarked, that Mahomedanism was quite as much indebted to the dissolution of the Roman empire, the weakness of its eastern division, and the general emasculation that afflicted society at that time, as to its own vitality, or even peculiar fitness for the climate of the East: so that, when we come to review all the facts, there really is nothing unnatural in the gradual overthrow of the Greek empire, and the consequent propagation of doctrines adapted to an age of transition, of ferocity, and of headlong passion. Circumstances accomplished more for the followers of Mahomet, than their enthusiasm or martial courage. All the wars in which they were successful were waged with enervated and enfeebled races—nations more dissolute in manners than themselves.

Their aggrandisements, however, were ample and complete; and after the conquest of Jerusalem, notwithstanding their perpetual wars amongst themselves, they gradually advanced, until they had quite hemmed in Constantinople, the capital of the phantom Eastern empire. Europe being in the thrall of ignorance and feudal barbarisms for several centuries, paid little attention to the affairs of the Holy Land; but when, in 1076, the Seljukian Turks obtained possession of Palestine, and, reversing the liberal policy of the Caliphs, treated Christian pilgrims to the holy shrines with cruelties that pierced the very soul, popular indignation rose superior to feudal violence, and all Europe sounded the alarm of war against the infidel. The fanaticism of Peter the Hermit commenced the crusades—those marvellous movements of the middle ages which wrought so much good for woman and for society, and yet effected so little for the welfare of the Christian Church, that, after a few triumphs and a protracted struggle, the Moslem power became more deeply rooted in the East, and finally prevailed, and survives to this day.

The causes of this failure are not very remote. Setting aside the consideration that the period was one of advance rather than re-action, the treachery and pusillanimity of the government of Constantinople threw every obstacle in the way of the invaders, whom it feared quite as much as it did the Moslems; then the freebooting character of the majority of the crusaders, and the ambition and jealousy of their leaders, materially interfered with the success of their designs. Add to all these explanations the fact, that the crusades were nothing more than attempts to re-establish a spiritual church by the sword, and further inquiry is not needed. It is far easier to build up a new church by the power of the sword, than it is to patch up an old one, fallen off from its original purity, and disgracefully relaxed in its discipline. In this respect, as to eventualities, the Moslems had a mighty advantage over the Christians; and, as if to still further increase that advantage, the crusaders emulated—indeed, occasionally transcended—their foes, in barbarity and savageness. Under these celebrated men, Godfrey of Bouillon, Robert of Normandy, Robert of France, Bohemund, chief of the Normans in Apulia, and Raymond, Count of Toulouse, they advanced to Jerusalem, to the melody of hymns and psalms, and cries of "Deus id vult!"—"God commands it!" After a siege of two months, Jerusalem fell; and what do we gather from history? Why, that thrice pitiless were the conquerors. Ten thousand of the followers of Mahomet were slain on the site of Solomon's Temple; a greater number were thrown from the tops of the houses, and a fearful carnage was committed after the enemy had sheathed their swords. In a document still preserved, the victors boasted that, in the Mosque of Omar, they rode in the blood of infidels, up to the knees of their horses.

On the day after the victory, the Latins massacred three hundred men, to whom Tancred and Gascon de Bearn had given a standard as a pledge of safety. Nor was this all. The inhabitants of Jerusalem, women with children at their breasts, boys, and young girls, were dragged forth into the public squares, and slain as the beasts of the earth. No heart was touched with the Christian grace of benevolence. The streets flowed with blood, and the impurity was afterwards washed away by Moslem slaves. So unrelenting was the passion of revenge among the crusaders, that they set fire to the Jewish synagogues, and many Jews perished in the flames. This second massacre is rendered more fearful from the circumstance that it was premeditated. The sun had gone down upon their wrath, and they arose with a fixed resolution of sparing neither man, woman, nor child.

After this horrible slaughter of the inhabitants of Jerusalem had ceased, and the warriors had performed their devotions, they proceeded to establish a form of government. Godfrey was chosen first Christian King of Jerusalem, and after a partition of territories among the other leaders, it appeared that their dominions extended from the confines of Egypt to the Euphrates, eastward, and to Mount Taurus, northwards—dominions co-extensive with those of David. But the triumph was polluted by blood and sin, and could not endure. It was an offence to the love and majesty of heaven.

However, as there was scant mercy in that age of remorseless fanaticism, all Europe exulted over the achievement; the Latin priests chuckled, and the Greek Church began nervously to imagine that the last shreds of its remaining authority were to be taken out of its hands. Then commenced those scenes of intrigue, rapine, and lawlessness which disgrace the page of history, and ultimately, to the secret delight of the Greek Church, the Christian empire in the East gradually crumbled away, leaving scarcely a vestige behind—most certainly not any extensive Christian community. The Moslems, after extirpating all the enemies that lay in their path, once more closed round Constantinople; and, on the 29th of May, 1453, that city fell into the possession of Mohammed II., who enlarged and consolidated what we now recognise as the Turkish empire, which, in its pristine vigour, was long the dread of Western Europe.

The Turk, fancying that he had a mission to conquer the West, and indoctrinate it with the new faith, under Solymán the Magnificent, attacked the Christian powers both by land and sea. He annexed Hungary to his vast dominions, captured Rhodes, and so terrified the Venetians, that they concluded an inglorious peace, by the cession of several important places in the Mediterranean. In fact, the tables were completely turned on the western powers.

The rage of Moslem made the Christian powers tremble at the name of Turk; and as the sultan could always advance through that open gate, Hungary, it began to be universally felt that the crusades, by indirectly contributing to the fall of Constantinople, had worked more evil than good for the Christian world. The cruelties of the crusaders had been amply avenged by the Ottoman power; it had rolled back the tide of western conquest, and even so alarmed the western popedom it had once so dreaded, that its tierced prince once seriously thought of fixing his throne amid the eternal snows of the tremendous Alps—when Providence laid its omnipotent hand on the Eastern potentate, and, chaining him to the shores of the Danube and the Bosphorus, fixed his destiny for ever.

The empire of the sword was soon to receive a most fatal wound. Some grand circumstances had changed the complexion of Europe. It was not the same as

When coward Asia shook in trembling bow,
And bent appalled before the Bactrian bow;
From the moist regions of the western star,
The wandering hermit waked the storm of war.

Some grand revelations had burst on the startled world. America and printing had been discovered to break the spell of ages, and fire the imagination with anticipations that made

The romance
Of many-coloured life that fortune pours
Round the crusaders,

look pale and dim in the promise of glories more bright and celestial than any that had ever before been accorded to mankind. Civilisation took to its bosom a great heart, and with one hand it kept the barbarous Turk at bay, with the other it prepared to assert the might and majesty of mind and industry over the terrors of the sword, the fanaticism of superstition, and the stone-blind ignorance that had so long bound the human soul in adamantine chains. A more intellectual, a more spiritual life was inaugurated by the most brilliant achievements in the whole range of history. The march of the true cross had commenced, and the rage of Moslem was thenceforth to boil harmlessly for Christianity, in a bosom that contained no traditions like those which, when placed on the honest brows of Time, bloom for ever.

The seal was set on the authority of Turk and Crusader. This is apparent—for, when feudalism was trampled under foot in the west, the church of Rome was humbled by the spread of knowledge, and the prestige of both destroyed. The fruits of this splendid dispensation have hitherto only been partially distributed—but there is rich promise of the dawn of a brighter and more blessed future.

At present the new crusade is only in its infancy, and must remain so until the preliminaries, far advanced in the west, are brought to some apparent order in the east. Turkey stands in the way of the march of the true cross—and the question has arisen, not how long she shall stand, but how and by whom she shall be removed? This difficulty receives some solution from the material aspect of the new crusade. Turkey is threatened with dismemberment by Russia, which received its Christianity from the Greek Pontiff, in the days when the Normans flourished, and laid the foundations of the Russian empire, and the Greeks themselves were plunged in anarchy and dissension. After Constantinople had been taken by the Turks, the Greek Church found a home and an asylum in Russia; and from that memorable 1453 began the natural antagonism which has ever since subsisted, and been frequently manifested, between the Russians and Turks. And it is curious to observe that, as—upon the cultivation of knowledge in the west, and the withdrawal of the Indian commerce from Turkey, after the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope route—the Ottoman power began to decline, Russia gradually advanced in importance as a nation. As if Providence had raised her up to chastise the Mahomedans, and not only teach mankind the lesson that the empire of the sword is the empire of sin and dust—but as if that, by her gigantic physical strength and rude sentiment, she was ordained to give the finishing stroke to a dispensation founded on rapine and violence, and upheld by sheer brute force.

That this is no idle speculation, the history of Russia amply substantiates. After the consolidation of the Russian empire, under the present dynasty, it became more than ever aggressive and conquering. Its march was southward. And when the war had commenced in earnest between the living head of the Greek Church and the descendant of its destroyer, Russia advanced—Turkey was driven backwards. And it may truly be said, that when Russia had fixed herself on the shores of the Black Sea, the prestige of Turkish domination had vanished. The hand of retribution had traced its doom on the wall of Time. Russia is still advancing. Her march southward appears irresistible. And in weighing the merits of this new crusade—this finish to those Christian and Mahomedan marches and counter-marches which lit up the middle ages with the lurid fires of war—we have to behold in the new crusaders, material and coarse though their mission may be—a nation young, vigorous, ardent, ambitious, and Christian; albeit its church is slimed over with superstition—a nation which, about the time the eastern capital of the Cæsars fell into the possession of the Turks, was like a chicken in its shell; but which in time resolutely broke that shell, and grew to be such a colossal bird that its wings stretched from the Baltic to the Black Sea. It absolutely fought its way to the sea, so as to possess maritime outlets, and is now one of the largest, most energetic, and best consolidated empires on the face of the earth. In audacity, and the will to work out great purposes, it is superior to what England was under Henry VIII. Possessing such an organisation and such impulses, Russia cannot be viewed through a Quakerised or peace-mongering medium, but in that wise, philosophic spirit which complacently regards English conquests as laudable acquisitions and active promoters of a grand scheme of universal peace and civilisation.

On the other hand, what is the condition of Turkey? Its aggregate intellect is marvellously poor, and its religion and institutions have laid a spell on its intellectual development. While the states of Western Europe have been progressing wonderfully, Turkey has been stationary. There is no mystery, therefore, in her debasement. It is not in the nature of things, that either the mind of man or the state of a community should remain stationary. When it ceases to advance, it must retrograde.

This is the history of Turkey in a sentence. And, now that her last days are approaching, let us ask, what has Turkey done to deserve the gratitude of the world? Has she given birth to any of the arts of civilisation? Has she repented of her fondness for war and its horrors, and applied herself to the cultivation of the works of peace? Has she attempted any internal improvements, or sought to raise her people in the scale of intelligence and morality? No! not one of these things has she done.

What, then, has Turkey done, that she should be retained in the constellation of empires? We will answer. She has worshipped war—it has been her passion—her god. She has reduced woman to the most abject, the lowest condition possible. She has been the most licentious, as well as the most ignorant of nations—stupid, barbarous, and sanguinary. She has wallowed in her degradation, and for generations has been a reproach and a blot on the accumulated enterprises, genius, and God-like tendencies of those nations of Europe who, having "taken time by the forelock," have carved out for themselves developments that must inevitably, in their appointed time, lift mankind nearer to that Divine perfection, which is at once the hope and the solace of all who believe in purer and more glorious existences than those by which we are at present surrounded.

The new crusade, therefore, to our apprehension, does not wear the ugly aspect in which it is regarded by politicians. To us it seems natural and pre-destined by circumstances. Old races must succumb to fresh and energetic ones—even as the Britons yielded to the Romans and the Saxons, and the latter to the Normans. Conquest of race is not extermination—it is a fusion to be effected by inter-marriage, the progress of industry, the cultivation of the arts and sciences, and the operation of those new circumstances which arise among nations just as they do among families.

Granted that it will be violent and forcible—Mahomed the Second used much force and violence when he sacked Constantinople; so did Wellington and Napoleon, when they fought battles and stormed cities; but as our civilisation has not been so finely cultivated as to prevent our effecting conquests in India, Burmah, China, and everywhere almost, by force and violence, we do denounce that portion of the objection to the dismemberment of Turkey as squeamish and hypocritical, and do not hesitate to declare our belief that the re-establishment of Christianity in the East is one of the requisites of the age; and that, until that mission has been accomplished, the tendencies created in the dawn of our era, and since awakened by discoveries and evoked by knowledge, are manacled and prevented from travelling to those fair regions where man and science first saw the light, and the Divinity was often manifested in a fearful and wondrous manner.

And if they dare reply,
Then give them all the lye.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

Day, like a warrior, stood
Upon the western height,
And pour'd his bright spears like a flood
Against the hosts of Night;
While banner-cloud and gleamy crest
Grew crimson in the stormy West!

Night called her hosts of pride,
To mark the Sun-King die;
And threw her starry pennons wide,
In triumph o'er the sky.
The monarch of the world of light
Fell throneless 'neath the foot of Night

From morn to cloudy eve
One paced the castle-tower;
So beautiful—oh, could she grieve
Who looked as though each hour
Brought roses to her lips, her cheek;
As music stayed to hear her speak!

And yet she wept, as one
Whose happiness was o'er;
The sunlight of whose soul was gone,
Whose life might bloom no more;
Whose years had faded fast, though few;
Like leaves whose veins ran lightning through

For he—her loved, her lord,
Her husband, whose renown
Lent fame to Britain's state and sword,
Shed glory o'er its crown—
Learnt that the debts which nations owe
Find cancel brief in headman's blow!

He whose heroic hand
Proved ever first to guard
The bulwarks of his native land,
Unmindful of reward,
Save that illustrious spirits claim
Within the godlike rolls of Fame!

He, the observed of all
Amidst the courtly throng,
Whom laurelled Spenser once did call
The nightingale of song;
Whose gifts to win all hearts appear'd—
Was't he the rabble scoffed and jeered?

Oh, noble to the last,
And to his death resigned,
He smiled upon the world, and passed
To seek that World of Mind,
That bright, that intellectual spring,
Hid 'neath the Everlasting wing!

Nor murmur, nor complaint,
Nor sigh for hopes decayed,
Nor did his manly heart once faint,
When grasp'd the headman's blade!
"Tis a sharp medicine to endure,"
He said, "but rarely fails to cure!"

Long past the hour his head
Fell gory 'neath the steel,
His wife yet listened for his tread;
Some hearts would surely feel
All were not hardened as the throne;
Some rescue yet would save her own!

And still the castle-tower
She paced each dreary day;
She knew, she said, it was his hour;
He would not long delay:
He loved his child with love too strong,
Living or dead, to quit them long!

And thus she hourly pined,
Till winter o'er her breast
Shed paleness, and her bloom declined
Like rose some foot hath press'd.
The light which could that bloom renew
Shone only 'midst the angel dew!

How, like a broken reed,
All worldly trust departs!
There is no hope for earthly need,
No rest for weary hearts,
Save his whose trust the Cross hath blest,
Eternal hope! immortal Rest!

THE GRAVES OF ÁTILA AND ALARIC.—Átila died in 453, and was buried in the midst of a vast plain, in a coffin, the first covering of which was of gold, the second of silver, and the third of iron. Along with the body were buried all the spoils of his enemies—harnesses enriched with gold and precious stones, rich stuffs, and the most valuable articles taken from the palaces of the kings which he had pillaged; and that the place of his interment might not be known, the Huns put to death, without exception, all those who had assisted at his funeral. The Goths had previously done the same for Alaric, who died in the year 410, at Cosenza, a city of Calabria. They turned for some days the course of the river Vassento, and having caused a trench to be dug in its former channel, where the stream was usually most rapid, they buried the king there, along with immense treasures. They put to death all those who had assisted in digging the grave, and restored the stream to its former bed.—Godfrey.

[VIEW OF THE CITY OF LYONS.]

THE CITY OF LYONS.

THE city of Lyons is one of the most ancient in France. Its authenticated history goes back so far as ten years before the present era—for we are informed that it was founded by Lucius Munatius Plancus, ten years before the birth of Christ. This Lucius conducted a colony of Romans from Vienna, from which they had been driven by the Allobroges—so that Lyons is emphatically a city of Roman origin, and its situation shows that considerable judgment was exercised in the selection. It is built on banks skirting the rivers Saône and Rhone. The latter receives the Saône into its bosom, about two miles below the city. The Saône is a fine river, and twice the size of the Seine at Paris.

Lyons is second only in importance to Paris, and has a population of 160,000. Seen externally, it is an exceedingly fine town; but the streets in its interior are narrow and dirty, like those of most French towns. It is called the Manchester of France, being celebrated for its manufactures of silks, satins, and velvets. Some of its public buildings are on a scale of grandeur approaching magnificence. Our view embraces the cathedral, and the bridge that crosses the Saône, at its foot. The cathedral is an imposing edifice, but, like many similar buildings in England, it is so buried in a mass of shops and dwellings, that it cannot be seen to much advantage. But the only really fine buildings in Lyons are the Hotel de Ville and Palais des Arts. All the other public edifices are very poor. The character and uses of some of them are, however, really excellent. The Hotel Dieu is an hospital of vast extent. It has an income of two millions of francs, and contains more beds than the great hospital in Paris. But what most surprised as well as gratified us, on our flying visit to the capital of the department of the Rhine and Loire, was the fact, that the principal duties of this vast establishment are performed gratuitously, by upwards of three hundred "Frères et Sœurs de la Charité." Some of the attendants were young girls, and it is strange as well as affecting to see them in the sombre garb of La Charité. They receive no pay—being merely clothed and fed—make no vows on entering, and are not obliged to remain longer than they choose. The "administration" can dismiss them at a moment's warning; but after fifteen years of service, they obtain a black cross, which entitles them to a perpetual asylum, from which they cannot be removed without some grave misdemeanour.

After reflecting upon these acts of Christian devotion, every true Protestant must certainly admit that there is something very striking in some of the effects of the Roman Catholic Church. In what other religion, for instance, do we find so many of its professors devote their whole lives to unrequited services of charity and benevolence? Here, in Lyons, are upwards of 300 men and women, many of them submitting to the strict discipline, the irksome confinement, and disgusting drudgery of a large hospital, without other fee or reward than that derived from the approval of their own breasts. And unquestionably the majority act from higher motives than by way of atonement for past sins, or to seek in occupation a refuge from disappointed hopes. A man may go into the splendid churches of the Roman Catholic faith, he may witness the gorgeous processions and the rich ceremonial of its worship, and exclaim, that all is vanity and empty pomp—that there is nothing betokening the influence of religion in the heart; but when he beholds the practical workings of the creed, as it is seen in the great hospitals and other charitable institutions, he must acknowledge that, if a sentiment of piety prevail less generally in France than elsewhere, there is no action on earth where, among a portion at least of its inhabitants, the visible fruits of religion are so zealously cultivated, and so richly developed. Except to the benevolent mind, no office is more irksome than that of an hospital nurse. In England it is one that is highly paid, and yet its duties are grudgingly performed. In France, on the contrary, the Sisters of Charity do everything without pay, with a cheerfulness and tenderness to the sick not elsewhere to be found. But probably this is not to be wondered at—for in every relation of life, what we do voluntarily is done with a better and readier grace than services rendered for gain. In the one case it is the heart that prompts, in the other, the love of money.

Of the population of Lyons we can only speak in terms of high commendation. The men are clever and industrious, the women pretty and amiable. Being of a warm temperament, they are naturally an excitable people. In periods of commotion they are the first to take arms, and fight desperately, sometimes for a very bad cause—the cause of turbulence and anarchy. In the pursuit of the abstract doctrines of the philosophers who view mankind through an impracticable medium, they are so vehement that they would change the aspect of society by a simple effort of the will, or one stroke of the pen. Their cultivated intelligence has led them into the sophisticated paths of overweening confidence in mere theories, blind devotion to quite a mythical form of government for France, and a species of self-glorification quite as ridiculous as it is mischievous. These characteristics require the permanent presence of a large armed force—in fact, Lyons is always garrisoned by an army of at least ten thousand men—being about one soldier to every sixteen men, women, and children. No English town would submit to such a state of control. The very stones in the streets would rise and mutiny. But in France the military are always immense favourites, and as they are not billeted upon the inhabitants, they are rather welcomed as countrymen than the armed guardians of the peace.

But the glory of Lyons is her manufactures—her costly satins, her glossy silks, her marvellous velvets. Those who visited the Great Exhibition of 1851, and who have been to the Exposition of Arts and Industry this year in Dublin, cannot have failed to have noticed the superior excellence of the productions of the Lyonnese manufacturers. They were unrivalled for beauty of design and excellence of workmanship. However, as we did ample justice to them in our notices of the grand display in Hyde Park, we will merely say, that silk has done for Lyons what cotton has effected for Manchester; and that the history of the silk manufactures would be about as interesting a volume as could well be compiled. The Chinese claim the merit of having originated the art, but as the Jews are the principal silk manufacturers in the empire, and are most numerous in the provinces in which silk-worms are reared, it has been conjectured that it was introduced by Jewish emigrants, after the conquests of Alexander. This, however, is very inconsistent with the lofty pretensions of the Chinese, one of whose historians speaks of brocades as being in use nearly three hundred years before our era. Silk-worms were introduced into Europe in the reign of the Emperor Justinian. The story runs, that two Persian monks, who had travelled to China, acquainted Justinian with the way of manufacturing silk in that country, and the mode in which it was obtained, and that they further agreed to bring him back some of the eggs. They were accordingly dispatched by him on this mission; and, after the lapse of a year or more, returned quite successful, bringing their store of eggs carefully concealed in a hollow cane. The eggs were put into a dunghill at Constantinople, and hatched by its heat, and the worms fed with mulberry leaves. The monks then showed the way to make use of the valuable thread which they spun.

For six hundred years the rearing of silk-worms in Europe was confined to Turkey, or the lower Greek empire, as it was then called. From thence it passed to Sicily; and in the thirteenth century, an Italian, who had seen the processes of breeding and spinning, introduced them into his own country, and commenced the silk manufactures there. Two hundred years more elapsed before the manufacture of silk was established in this country—France and Spain having previously become acquainted with it.

Very many attempts have been made to promote the breeding and rearing of silk-worms in England, for the purposes of commerce; but all of them have signally failed. The spot now occupied by Buckingham Palace was formerly a garden of mulberry-trees, planted for the purpose of promoting one of these attempts. The climate is so unfavourable, that all hope of success in such an undertaking must be abandoned.

The rearing of the silk-worm, and the manufacture of silk, was not known in India until four hundred years after they had been introduced into Europe. Of late years, much attention has been bestowed upon this branch of commerce, in the British possessions in India. The quantity grown is rapidly increasing, and the quality is said to improve. In the Deccan, the mulberry-trees thrive with the most surprising luxuriance; and being in perpetual vegetation, may be deprived of their leaves six times a year; and this without injury to them, provided a few leaves are allowed to remain at the tops of the branches. The worm is also so rapid in its operations, that six crops of silk can be with ease obtained. In Italy they are obliged to have recourse to stoves and warm currents of air to heat the rooms, in order to hatch the egg, and rear the worm in its natural temperature. From sudden changes of atmosphere, also, the insect in Italy is liable to disease. In the Deccan, the producers labour under none of these disadvantages. The silk-worm there, being in its natural climate, requires no artificial heat at all. The climate of the Deccan, from its great elevation, from the mildness of the rains, from its temperature, dryness, and equality, is the most congenial to the silk-worm of any in the world.

Some of the silk produced in France is thought most highly of by manufacturers, and the quantity which is annually obtained there is said to amount to three mil-

Hon pounds; but this is not half the amount that is produced in Italy, the quality of which stands high in the market.

In Russia, too, large quantities are grown. From the year 1836 to the year 1840, it is said that the quantity of silk consumed in our manufactures amounted to four millions nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand seven hundred and ninety-one pounds. The very thought of the immense number of insects required to produce this, overwhelms the mind. Allowing each cocoon to weigh about three grains, to produce the quantity of silk consumed in Great Britain alone, during the above-mentioned space, would require as many silk-worms as would reach more than eight times round the world, if they were placed the one in a line with the other.

FACETIÆ.

FORTUNATE.—The two neighbours who "fell out," have got in again. Neither of them were injured.

COURAGE.—A traveller relating his adventures, told the company that he and his servant had made fifty wild Arabs run; which startling them, he observed, that there was no great matter in it—"for," says he, "we ran, and they ran after us."

HOW TO RISE EARLY.—Live next door to a house where Cochon China fowls are kept.

Two men went to "California." One came back without a rag to his back, while the other came back with nothing but rags. Wanted to know which did the best?

"NANCY," said a girl to her companion, "which railroad train do you like the best?" "That one," replied Nancy, "which furnishes a spark-catcher!"

The man who minds his own business has a good, steady employment.

A benevolent gentleman was discovered holding an umbrella over the statue of the Queen, in the square of the Royal Exchange.

An irregular apprentice keeping late hours, his master at length took occasion to apply some weighty arguments, to convince him of the error of his ways. During the chastisement, he continually exclaimed: "How long will you serve the devil?" The boy replied, whimpering, "You know best, sir—I believe my indentures will be out in three months."

An industrious tradesman having taken a new apprentice, awoke him at a very early hour on the first morning, by calling out that the family were sitting down to table. "Thank you," said the boy, as he turned over in the bed, to adjust himself for a new nap—"thank you, I never eat anything during the night!"

A lawyer, not over young nor handsome, examining a young lady witness in court, determined to perplex her, and said: "Miss, upon my word you are very pretty!" The young lady very promptly replied: "I would return the compliment, if I were not on oath!"

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"—The noted Chinese rebel-chief, who is overrunning the empire with his army of insurgents, and who threatens to overthrow the present dynasty, assumes a strange title: he styles himself Great Tranquillity. These Celestials are a droll people.

EFFECTUAL PREVENTIVE.—There exists in some parts of Germany a law to prevent drinking during Divine service. It runs thus: "any person drinking in an alehouse during Divine service on Sunday, or other holyday, may legally depart without paying."

A LEGAL JOKE.—"Well, George," asked a friend of a young lawyer, who had been "admitted" about a year, "how do you like your new profession?" The reply was accompanied by a brief sigh to suit the occasion: "My profession is much better than my practice."

AN ILL-USED BACHELOR.—A bachelor is published in the papers of Perropolis, for having refused to pay his washerwoman's bill. He publishes a card, stating that he refuses to pay, because she washed all the white out of his shirts.

ELEGANT FLATTERY.—The Duke of Guise, after a battle fought between Francis I. and Charles V., reproached one Villandry that, though in complete armour, he had not been seen in the fight. "I will make it out," said the other, boldly, "that I was there, and in a place where you durst not be seen." The duke, nettled at this reproach, threatened to punish him severely, but he appeased him with these words: "I was, my lord, with the baggage, where your courage would not suffer you to go."

AN ARTICLE OF TRIFLING VALUE.—Montesquieu was disputing a point of fact with a man of very positive disposition, but one who was not overburdened with sense. The latter said to him: "M. Montesquieu, if the fact is not as I have stated, I'll give you my head." "I accept it," said M. Montesquieu; "for trifles show respect."

AUTHORS.—Hood, in an article of singular humour, states, that the phrase "republic of letters" was hit upon to insinuate that, taking the whole lot of authors together, they had not got a sovereign amongst them.

MRS. SMITH ON MAN.—In her lecture the other night, Mrs. Smith summed up her opinion of man thus: "If a man wishes a job of work done cheap, he employs a woman; if he has a bad bill to pass off, he gives it to a woman; if he has a fit of the sullen, he shows it to a woman; if he has any petty trick or low abuse that would cost him a libel suit, or a broken head, if practised upon a man, he gives a woman the benefit of it, because there is no redress for her."

THE REV. MR. GILLESPIE, OF AMERICA, in his "Lectures to Young Men on the Formation of Character," says very forcibly: "I can't do it" never did anything; "I'll try," has worked wonders; and "I will do it," has performed prodigies.

FUTILE CONSOLATION.—A clergyman called on a poor parishioner, whom he found bitterly lamenting the loss of an only son, a boy of about four or five years old. In the hope of consoling the afflicted woman, he remarked to her, that "one so young could not have committed any very grievous sin; and that no doubt the child was gone to heaven." "Ah, sir," said the simple-hearted creature, "but Tommy was so shy,—and they are all strangers there!"

A PALPABLE HIT.—One West, a stump orator, wishing to describe his opponent as a soulless man, said: "I have heard some persons hold to the opinion that just at the precise moment after one human being dies, another is born; and that the soul enters and animates the new-born babe. Now I have made particular and extensive inquiries concerning my opponent there, and I find that for some time previous to his nativity, nobody died. Fellow citizens, you may draw the inference."

MISAPPLICATION OF WORDS BY FOREIGNERS.—The misapplication of English words by foreigners is often very ludicrous. A German friend saluted us once with, "Oh, good bye—good bye!"—meaning, of course, "How d'ye do?" It is said that Dr. Chalmers once entertained a distinguished guest from Switzerland, whom he asked if he would be helped to "kippered" salmon. The foreign divine asked the meaning of the uncouth word "kippered," and was told that it meant "preserved." The poor man, in a public prayer soon after, offered a petition that the distinguished divine might long be "kippered to the Free Church of Scotland."

DENNIS, THE CRITIC.—Among other peculiarities of this author was his intolerance of punning; such insurmountable antipathy did he entertain towards this species of wit, that he would quit the company where puns were made. The following is not generally known. One night at Button's, Steele was desirous of excluding Dennis from a party he wished to make, but which he could not conveniently manage, Dennis being at that time in the coffee-room. While he was at a loss how to get rid of him, he observed Rowe sitting on the opposite side of the box to Dennis, and asked the latter: "What was the matter with him?" "What do you mean by the question?" inquired the critic. To which the other replied: "You appeared to me like an angry waterman, for you look one way and Rowe another." The effect of this pun was successful; and the critic left the room, execrating all puns and punsters.

AN HONEST CONFESSION.—The course of true love never does run smooth. A young gentleman of our acquaintance lately found it so; and, as he thought, to punish the hesitating fair one, rushed off and married himself to another. He was a splendidly handsome fellow. The subject being talked of at some party, one of the company asked, "Was it not very sudden?" I did not know that he was even acquainted with her." Upon some one answering, "He was a foolish fellow, and, being angry with Miss Smith, determined to marry the first girl he met, in his pique," a young lady, who was present, innocently exclaimed: "Oh, dear me! I wish he had met me in his pique!" We never heard of a better specimen of thinking aloud.

PROVING AN ALIBI.—A clergyman at Cambridge preached a sermon, which one of his auditors commended. "Yes," said a gentleman to whom it was mentioned, "it was a good sermon; but he stole it!" This was told to the preacher. He resented it, and called on the gentleman to retract what he had said. "I am not," replied the aggressor, "very apt to retract my words; but in this instance I will. I said you had stolen the sermon: I find I was wrong—for on returning home, and referring to the book whence I thought it was taken, I found it there!"

A CLEVER BOY.—A farmer's wife, in speaking of the smartness, aptness, and intelligence of her son, a lad six years old, to a lady acquaintance, said: "He can read fluently in any part of the Bible, repeat the whole Catechism, and weed onions as well as his father." "Yes, mother," added the young hopeful; "and yesterday I licked Ned Rawson, and threw the cat into the well!"

NEVER GIVE UP!—The following account of the pursuit of a partner under difficulties, is related by Southey, as being literally true. It pointedly illustrates the advantages of persevering: "A gentleman being in want of a wife, advertised for one, and at the time and place appointed was met by a lady. Their situations in life entitled them to be so called, and the gentleman as well as the lady was in earnest. He, however, unluckily, seemed to be of the same opinion as King Pedro was with regard to his wife, Queen Mary of Arragon—that she was not as handsome as she might be good—and the meeting ended in their mutual disappointment. He advertised a second time, appointing a different square for place of meeting, and varying the words of the advertisement. He met the same lady—they recognised each other—could not choose but smile at the recognition, and perhaps neither of them could choose but sigh. You will anticipate the event. The persevering bachelor tried his lot a third time in the newspapers, and at the third place of appointment met the equally persevering spinster. At this meeting neither could help laughing. They began to converse in good humour, and the conversation became so agreeable on both sides, and the circumstance appeared so remarkable, that this third interview led to the marriage, and the marriage proved a happy one."

A YOUNG BLADE.—"Would you not have known this boy to be my son, from his resemblance to me?" asked a gentleman. Mr. Curran answered: "Yes, sir; the maker's name is stamped upon the blade."

HOPE.—Hope is a slender reed for a stout man to lean on; but it's strong enough, I do suppose, for them that's infirm of mind and purpose. The houses Hope builds are castles in the air. The houses of the wretched who are altogether without Hope are too dismal to live in. A slight infusion of Hope may be prescribed in bad cases but strong doses weaken the mind, loosen the morals, and destroy the happiness of those who indulge in them. The true rule is, perhaps, not to let Hope build a house for you, or to live with you in it; but he might come to visit you sometimes, to cheer you up a little by talking pleasant, and getting you to look on the bright side of things when you are in a solemnly mood. Hope is a pleasant acquaintance, but an unsafe friend. He'll do on a pinch for a travelling companion, but he is not the man for your banker.—Sam Stick's Wise Saws.

RABBITS IN PARIS.—Under the head of "Rabbits in Paris," we extract the following, which is somewhat amusing. A gentleman relating the incidents of his travels while in Paris, says: "I entered a restaurant on the other side of the Seine, and ordered a rabbit. I was green—verdant as the first cucumber—even as early peas—or I should not have done this. The rabbit came, and I offered the Moniteur to an old Frenchman opposite, whose eyes were fixed upon my plate, but he bowed a negative. The bow puzzled me. It was too much. 'Monsieur has not been long in Paris?' 'No, I have just arrived.' 'Monsieur is going to eat that?' 'Yes, may I offer you a slice?' 'Monsieur will allow me to make a small observation?' inquired the Frenchman, with a frightful grimace. 'Certainly,' I replied, becoming alarmed. 'Monsieur, that rabbit once mewed!' he replied, with the utmost gravity."

A PRACTICAL JOKER.

ROMIEU pays a visit to a grocer:

"Good day, sir."

"Sir, I am your humble servant."

"Have you candles, eight to the pound?"

"Certainly, sir, it is a good selling article, as, in this city of ours, the little purses much exceed the big ones in number."

"Sir, that remark of yours smacks more of profound observation than the mere shop."

"Sir, you do me the honour."

Romieu and the grocer salute.

"Monsieur was saying that he wanted —"

"One candle, eight to the pound."

"Only one?"

"One to begin with; we will then see about the rest."

"Here it is, sir."

"Please cut it in two; I hate to touch a candle."

"No wonder, sir—the smell is not pleasant; here is the candle out."

"Ah, by the way, will you have the kindness to divide each half into four parts?"

"Into four?"

"Precisely, I want eight pieces for a certain purpose."

"Very well, sir; here are the eight."

"I am really too troublesome, but will you oblige me by clearing the wicks of all?"

"The whole eight?"

"The whole seven: one piece has the wick already prepared."

"True enough."

"Now be so good as to set them in a straight line on the counter, three inches apart."

"But what is that for?"

"You shall soon see: please hand me a match."

And Romieu gravely lighted the eight candle-ends.

"What in the world are you doing, sir?"

"Sir, I am executing a practical joke."

"And then?"

"Then, as the joke is at an end, I beg to take my leave, with thanks for your civility."

Romieu saluted the grocer, and walked out.

"And are you going away without even paying for the candle? At all events pay for the candle."

Romieu turned round.

"And if I did, where would be the joke, let me ask you?"

AN EMPTY POCKET—A FULL POCKET.

Yes; and don't you presume to show yourself anywhere, until you get it filled. "Not among good people?" No, my dear Simplicity, not among "good people!" They will receive you with a galvanic ghost of a smile, scared up by an indistinct recollection of the Ten Commandments; but it will be as short-lived as their stay with you! You are not welcome—that's the amount of it. They are all in a perspiration, lest you should be delivered of a request for their assistance before they can get rid of you. They are "very busy;" and, what's more, they always will be busy when you call, until you get to the top of fortune's ladder! Climb, man—climb! get to the top of the ladder, though adverse circumstances and false friends break every round in it, and see what a glorious and extensive prospect of human nature you'll get, when you arrive at the summit! Your gloves will be worn out shaking hands with the very people who didn't recognise your existence two months ago. "You must come and make them a long visit;" "you must step in at any time;" "you'll always be welcome;" it is such a long time since they had the pleasure of a visit from you, that they begin to fear you never intended to come; and they'll cap the climax, by inquiring, with an injured air, "If you are near-sighted, or why you have so often passed them in the street without speaking?"

Of course you will feel very much like laughing in their faces—and so you can. You can't do anything wrong, now that your "pocket is full." At the most, it will only be "an eccentricity." You can use anybody's neck for a footstool, bridle anybody's mouth with a silver bit, and have as many "golden opinions" as you like. You won't see a frown again, between this and your tombstone!

LONDON WITHOUT A POLICEMAN.—There is a threat of all the policemen striking. We doubt if London will perceive the difference, even supposing that they do.—Punch.

THE ETIQUETTE OF SMOKING.—Light your cigar first, and, after you have taken one or two whiffs, turn round, and inquire, most politely, "If smoking is disagreeable."—Ibid.

DIETETIC RULE OF CONDUCT.—Never ask a favour of a man until he has had his dinner.—Ibid.

THE MAIMS OF MONEY.—You scarcely ever receive change for a sovereign, without finding that one of the shillings or sixpences has had a hole drilled through it, which—suggesting a painful doubt as to the exchangeable value of the coin—is altogether a bore. We are glad that Mr. Wilson has got leave to bring in a bill to prevent the defacing of the Queen's money; and we hope this measure will have the effect of remedying one of the greatest evils of change.—Ibid.

ACCORDING TO ACT OF PARLIAMENT.—Lady: "Your fare's sixpence, I think? Please to knock at the door. Cabby: Not if I know it, marm.—The hact 'bleeges me to take sixpence a mile, but it don't 'bleege me to knock at a door!—Ibid.

STRIKING CIRCUMSTANCES.

JOHN BULL may almost be described as a maniac with lucid intervals. He appears to be always suffering under some form of mania or other. A few years ago it was the railway mania—a very dangerous frenzy. Then from time to time occurs a poultry mania, or one of the similar and milder forms of insanity. The mania now prevailing is one which, if not attended to, may perhaps prove troublesome. This is the striking mania. Everybody is striking. The other day it was the cabmen; now it is the dockyard labourers; the policemen, even, have struck, and thrown down their staves. Our mechanics have so far become machines, that, like clocks, as clocks ought to be, they are all striking together.

Should this mania spread, we shall have striking become what might be called the order, but that it will be the disorder, of the day. The professions will strike; you will send for your lawyer to make your will, and your messenger will return with non est inventus—struck; or should you ask the legal gentleman a six-and-eightpenny question, you will discover that he has struck for 13s. 4d. The physicians and surgeons will strike for two-guinea fees; the apothecaries for ten-shilling mixtures. The clergy will all strike—as indeed some of them, the poor curates, might reasonably do—and pluralists will be demanding forty-thousand a year instead of twenty; whilst bishops will hang up the mitre, stick the crozier over the chimney-piece, and hold out against the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for double incomes. In short, almost everybody will strike except the threshers, the smiths, and the pugilists.

With all this striking, though, we had better take care that we are not flogged.—Ibid.

AN OLD PROVERB MODERNISED.—It's a long table that has no turning.—Diogenes.

A CABINET QUESTION.—Lord Clarendon requested the Lord Chancellor to state what, in his opinion, was the difference (legally) between occupation and tenancy? The Lord Chancellor considered the present occupation of the principalities by the Czar was coincident with the acts of his generals therein, these being clearly acts of lieutenantancy.—Ibid.

AN ENGINEER'S INGENUITY.—An engine stoker's knowledge of the art of punctuation is sufficiently illustrated by the fact of his putting the coal on to prevent a full stop.—Ibid.

DRAWINGS IN CHALK.—The London milk-pails.—Ibid.

A HUE AND CRY.—When an advertised dyo turns your hair a bright green!—Ibid.

SINGULAR COINCIDENCES.

We frequently see a paragraph in the papers headed "Singular Coincidences," which upon perusal fails as often as not to furnish us with the most remote connection of subject. In order, therefore, that our readers may judge of what we consider a coincidence, we beg to present them with the following:

The occupant of a house happening to have stepped out just two minutes before the tax-collector called for the rates.

A tailor having a large bill to meet on the very day that he requests payment of your small account.

A friend, of whom you wish to borrow 5*l.*, happening, strangely enough, to be in want of the same sum himself.

And a relative in the country, whom you propose sojourning with next week, being unable to accommodate you, owing to an expected visit from an old maiden aunt, at the very same period.—Ibid.

SUNSET AND MOON ON MONT BLANC.

At first, everything about us—above, around, below—the sky, the mountains, and the lower peaks—appeared one uniform expanse of brilliant gold, so brightly dazzling that, now our vision became so dazzled, we could scarcely bear the splendour. As the twilight gradually crept over the lower world, the glow became still more vivid; and presently, as the blue mists rose in the valleys, the tops of the higher mountains looked like islands rising from a filmy ocean—an archipelago of gold. By degrees, this metallic lustre was softened into tints—first orange, and then bright, transparent crimson—along the horizon, rising through the different hues with prismatic regularity, until, immediately above us, the sky was a deep, pure blue, merging towards the east into glowing violet. The snow took its colour from these changes; and every portion on which the light fell was soon tinged with pale carmine, of a shade similar to that which snow at times assumes, from some imperfectly explained cause, at high elevations; such, indeed, as I had seen, in early summer, upon the Furka and Paulhorn. These beautiful hues grew brighter, as the twilight below increased in depth; and it now came marching up the valley of the glaciers, until it reached our resting-place. Higher and higher still it drove the lovely glory of the sun-light before it, until at last the vast Dôme du Goûté and the summit itself stood out, ice-like and grim, in the cold evening air, although the horizon still gleamed with a belt of rosy light. * * *

The stars had come out, and, looking over the plateau, I soon saw the moonlight lying cold and silvery on the summit, stealing slowly down the very track by which the sunset glories had passed upward and away. But it came so tardily, that I knew it would be hours before we derived any actual benefit from the light. One after another the guides fell asleep, until only three or four remained round the embers of the fire, thoughtfully smoking their pipes; and then silence, impressive beyond expression, reigned over our isolated world.

Often and often, from Chamouni, I had looked up at evening towards the darkening position of the Grands Mulets, and thought, almost with shuddering, how awful it must be for men to pass the night in such a remote, eternal, and frozen wilderness! And now I was lying there, in the very heart of its ice-bound and appalling solitude. In such close communion with nature in her grandest aspect, with no trace of the actual living world beyond the mere speck that our little party formed, the mind was carried far away from its ordinary trains of thought—a solemn emotion of mingled awe and delight, and yet self-perception of abject nothingness, alone rose above every other feeling. A vast, untrodden region of cold, and silence, and death, stretched out far and away from us on every side; but above, heaven, with its countless watchful eyes, was over all!—Albert Smith's Mont Blanc.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

It is with narrow-souled people as with narrow-necked bottles—the less they have in them, the more noise they make in pouring it out.

A forward and talkative young man is not likely ever to become a great man.

SHARP jests are the most likely of all things to sever the delicate chords of affection.

ELOQUENCE consists, not in the spoken words, but in the feeling with which they are spoken, and their suitability to the occasion.

NONE are so hard to please as those whose satiety of pleasure makes weary of themselves; nor any so readily provoked as those who have been always courted with an emulation of civility.

ONE great and kindling thought from a retired and obscure man, may live, when thrones are fallen, and the memories of those who filled them obliterated.

THOSE who are always mending the road to heaven, have no time to pursue it; as the man who carries the lantern stumbles oftener than he who follows him.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A GENTLEMAN EXECUTED FOR THE MURDER OF A SLAVE.—Some time between 1800 and 1805, Lord Seaforth being Governor of Barbadoes, a slaveowner having killed one of his own slaves, was tried for the murder, and acquitted—the law considering that such an act was not murder. Thereupon Lord Seaforth came to England, obtained an Act of Parliament declaring the killing of a slave to be murder, and returned to Barbadoes, to resume his official duties. Soon afterwards another slave was killed by his owner, who was tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged for murder, under the new Act of Parliament. At the time appointed, the prisoner was brought out for execution, but so strong was the public feeling, that the ordinary executioner was not forthcoming, and on the governor requiring the sheriff to perform his office, either in person or by deputy, after some excuses, he absolutely refused. The governor then addressed the guard of soldiers, desiring a volunteer for executioner, adding, "whoever would volunteer, should be subsequently protected, as well as rewarded then." One presented himself; and it thenceforth became as dangerous to kill a slave as a freeman in Barbadoes.

RECOVERED GREEK ORATIONS.—Mr. Arden, whose archaeological pursuits are highly appreciated, having purchased from an Arab, at the sepulchral diggings about Luxor, a roll of papyrus, has been instrumental in the recent publication of two pleadings at the Greek bar, deliciously deciphered from the reporter's notes, which, from the fact of their being three centuries older than the Christian era, claim precedence in seniority before all known MSS. Longinus had a high opinion of the orator, Hyperides, and notices him most favourably; the Bibliotheca of Photius records the existence then of forty of his orations; but we are now lucky in possessing a single brace of specimens, one referring to the defence in a case of crim. con., and the other to a mining dispute. The first is quite deficient in either the prurency or the pathos which such indictments exhibit in modern days, and the latter is not so copious or intricate as the great argument in Small versus Alwood. Their main value is philological, in respect to a new use of a few terms; some light is thrown on marriage processions and legal process; and we learn that the gay Lothario was a cavalry officer in garrison at Lemnos, an island on which it will be remembered Vulcan fell, when put violently from his matrimonial suit in the courts above. Scanty as were the materials of this papyrus roll, Mr. Arden's zeal and efforts to secure the best readings of the text, and to engrave the precious original, are beyond praise. Mr. Arden paid 320 Turkish piastres to the Bedouin, who found the Greek scroll in a Theban tomb.

EXTRAORDINARY FLIGHT OF CARRIER PIGEONS.—Several pigeons thrown up at Bordeaux, at 5 o'clock on the morning of Saturday, July 30, reached Brussels the same day. The first bird entered the dovecot at 40 minutes after 5 in the evening: thus accomplishing in 12 hours a journey of 211 leagues, or 18 leagues (about 54 miles) per hour, for 12 consecutive hours.

IMPORTATION OF EGGS.—There was an increase in the importation of eggs in June last, compared with the same period of last year. In the month ended July 5, 1852, the number was 12,079,915, and in the month ended July 5, 1853, 16,030,834.

A FIGHT BETWEEN A SHARK AND A TURTLE.—One day, while lying at anchor, and whistling for a breeze, the steward rushed in with the strange announcement that a shark and a turtle were engaged in a fight alongside. Doubtful and amazed at the account of so unusual and so unequal a combat, we all rushed on deck, and there, sure enough, we saw an immense shark and a turtle of venerable antiquity, if one might judge by his size, and the profusion of barnacles and other parasites with which he was decorated. Without respect for his age and Quaker-like habits, the shark made furious charges at poor turtle, who opposed the dangerous jaws of the enemy with the full front of his back, on which no impression could be made. On one occasion the turtle did not turn quite sharply enough, which cost him the greater part of one unlucky flipper. Indignant at the perversion of such an eldermanic banquet to the voracious and indiscriminating appetite of a shark, our skipper intervened with a harpoon, but with such ill-judged aim, that it fell butt-end foremost instead of on the point: whereupon, in our disappointment, we would gladly have pitched him after it. It, however, answered the purpose of scaring away the shark for a few moments, which the turtle made the most of to scuttle off to the bottom, where he was safe from the attacks of his ravenous admirer.—Recollections of China.

SINGULAR PHENOMENON.—A few evenings since, a most extraordinary phenomenon was observed on the river in this vicinity. Between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock, p.m., while looking on the sea towards the opposite coast of Helensburgh, the whole water appeared to be one vast sheet of white flame. It was at first sight impossible to make out what was the cause of such an extraordinary phenomenon, but by-and-by on-lookers became aware that it must be caused by the play of phosphorescent light over the ripple of the waves. Standing on the shore, and looking north, the whole expanse of sea-reach, for four or five miles in breadth, and more than a dozen in length, was one vast sheet of silvery light, so bright that it was nearly equal to the lights exhibited by the shipping at anchor in the roadstead. Behind rose the dark and distant hills, while the density of the clouds, the dimness of the moonlight, and the moaning of the sea, all added to the beauty of this strange nocturnal scene. The tide was a half-ebb, with a stiff breeze blowing in from the north-west, causing a long, steady swell of waves while near the shore the darkness of the water was illuminated by their ripple casting up a foam of light, which broke into scintillations of prismatic colours. Humboldt, in his "Cosmos," or "Aspects of Nature," gives a description of such a scene, when speaking of geognostic phenomena.—Greenock Advertiser.

THE ERA IN WHICH JOB LIVED.—The time of Job's existence is not less remote than his situation and manners. It is involved in the highest antiquity. We must unroll the records of time beyond all other history, except the brief accounts contained in the early chapters of the Book of Genesis. Not only had the Roman empire not arisen, the Roman city not been founded, but even those Etrurian kings, whose tombs, after being closed from all human sight since a thousand years before the Christian era, have recently disclosed their crowned and sceptred tenants, to glitter a moment, and vanish into dust—even these had not yet learned to sway the sceptre, or their subjects to delve the virgin soil. The Grecian states were as yet unsettled by Pelops in the south, or the wandering Pelasgi from the north. The Egyptian monarchy, and its mighty rivals in Nineveh and Babylon, the warlike children of Ham, did alone divide the empire of the East; for Persia and Medea had not yet risen into notice. No great state had been formed from the sacred family of Shem; but petty kings ruled in Canaan, and over the free tribes of the East, who wandered far and wide for pasture and merchandise, without limit or restraint, over the yet unclosed regions between the Nile and the Euphrates, the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulf. The pyramids had probably not yet reared their all-enduring summits; and only the sun-burned masses of Babylon, and the scorched marbles of Nineveh or Calah, remain to remind us of those mighty nations which were contemporary with the patriarch Job.—Hilbert.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALFRED R.—A person wishing to be married by banns, must have resided in the parish in which the banns were published, fourteen clear days before the performance of the ceremony.

BRAMPTON.—Take care. Although the ceremony was performed at Gretna Green, the marriage was valid, and neither you nor your wife can marry again. Employ the interposition of friends, to bring about a reconciliation.

T. D.—Such terms as "Lord Aberdeen's ministry," or "Lord John Russell's ministry," are employed to designate the set of men who are supposed to adopt and carry out the views of the premier. 2. The phrase "Conservative Party," is now very indistinct. To the public generally, it means the remnant of the old Tory party.

ANXIE.—Let the gentleman (?) come round of his own accord. If you place a half-drowned puppy-dog on the grass, it soon recovers.

FAITHFUL.—After being accepted by a young lady, you went to reside at a distance, and wrote twice to her, but received no reply to either letter. Hope for the best. Illness may have been the cause, or the letters may have been intercepted, or the young lady may be a negligent correspondent; there are a thousand things which may interrupt the course of true love. Take a trip to Reading. Remember, "to be once in doubt is to be at once resolved."

AMY ROBERT.—A fortune-hunter is one of the most despicable of men. He treats marriage just like a game at cards or a throw of the dice. It is fortunate for society that in this kind of gambling the losers are the vast majority of the blackguard fraternity. You ask us for our opinion. We give it. The man who would marry a woman solely for her money, would cheat a friend, pick a pocket in a crowd, break open a cash-box, embezzle, commit forgery—in fact, be capable of anything dishonest. The man that could cheat a confiding woman, would not hesitate to do anything bad or monstrous.

MIRANDA.—Two of your young lady (?) acquaintances smoke, do they? Depend upon it they have been keeping company with a couple of fast young men, and are themselves going too fast either for their health or reputation. Having fallen so far, remonstrance would be useless. Of course you have cut their acquaintance? Women who smoke must drink something stronger than tea.

ELIZABETH EDMONDS.—There are four St. Luke's Churches in the metropolis—viz., 1, Chelsea; 2, Weston Place, King's Cross; 3, Old Street, Clerkenwell; 4, Berwick Street, Soho.

ALPHA.—In France, all persons seventy years of age and upwards are exempted from arrest for debt. The English law, pertinaciously barbarous to the unfortunate, makes no such charitable distinction.

H. T. A.—To make a good red sealing-wax, take one pound of yellow resin, five ounces and a half of gum lac, five ounces and a half of Venice turpentine, and one ounce of vermilion. Dissolve the resin, lac, and turpentine first, and then stir in the vermilion.

W. S. P.—You wish to win a very handsome girl, with a "good amount of money," from another, whom she likes, but who is rather unsteady. You have no money. You are not a phenomenon—more's the pity; but there's some consolation in feeling convinced that you will be thwarted in your aims. Neither the handsome girl nor "the amount of money" will ever be yours. Coveting the grapes, you will pronounce them sour by-and-bye—very.

S. H. E. PREST.—Having given the young man encouragement, you are not now to cast him off like an old shoe. Address to him a mild, womanly letter, for the purpose of showing to him that your early girlish impression has quite disappeared. As you cannot reciprocate his affection, be firm and explicit, but kind. In these cases, girls will allow the men they don't like—or say they don't like—to dangle at their heels, and then, when the poor young fellows, thus slightly encouraged, persevere, they are complained of as bores and disagreeables. Girls should not be too kittenish with young men.

J. T. LILLEY.—Certainly the struggle is coming. The peace of Europe is not worth a month's purchase. We said so five years ago. The tempest will commence in the East—Turkey—then travel to the West, and not subside until the East and the West have settled their bitter quarrel of some centuries' standing. Don't be guided by the politicians—they are moles burrowing in the dark. They can scribble fluently, and that is all they can do. In vindictive power, they are below Zadkiel, the Ser, in contempt.

IN EARNEST.—Bashfulness is more a weakness than a habit. It is chiefly caused by parents foolishly secluding their children from society, checking their natural gaiety, and endeavouring to impose on them an unnatural artificiality. As regards your case, we should advise you to become a member of a literary society, and so have an opportunity of meeting young men au fait in the usages and affairs of the world.

R. SECONDS.—Once, twice, sometimes thrice—but always once in the life of a woman, she is radically whimsical, and will rather break her heart than yield, even should the motive be very trifling or very absurd. All such diseases cure themselves. Indifference is the best medicine. The sex can tolerate almost any behaviour in the men they regard, but that biting, stinging, and withering one—indifference.

HANNAH H. informs us that a gentleman, whom she likes exceedingly, pays her great attention, but, when out walking together, his conversation is invariably about parish affairs. Well, and why does not Hannah talk about parish affairs, also? That would show him that she took an interest in his favourite pursuits. The surest way to a man's esteem is to flatter his vanity; and when that position is once gained, and the parties are impossible and eligible, love follows imperceptibly, but as a matter of course. We will give Hannah, and all girls situated like her, a hint. The shafts of Cupid often—much oftener than is supposed—find their way to the heart of man through the aperture in the letter-box of business.

A. A., an apprentice, fourteen years of age, committed a trifling theft, and, rather than go before a magistrate, agreed to allow his master to whip him as often and as much as he liked. He has been whipped on fourteen Sundays, and on each occasion received twenty-five lashes—which makes three hundred and fifty lashes he has already received. His master says he has not yet whipped his crime out of him; and the poor boy dreads the coming of every Sunday—for then the wife is out—gone to chapel, we presume—and the servant is sent out of the way—and he is tied to a ladder, or fastened by the neck and legs to a table, stark naked, and whipped unmercifully. Being destitute of friends, he is afraid of running away. His master must be an unmitigated brute. It would seem that the blood of the boy spouting from his back on one Sunday, only whetted the monster's appetite for another private laceration on the following Sunday. The boy must make his pitiable case known to the public, through the medium of the police authorities or the nearest clergyman. After the tortures to which he has been subjected, he need not fear being punished for his error, of which he is truly repentant, and we trust will ever continue so, and be honest in thought and act. His offence of a master would be punished for his sly and ruffianly conduct to a boy who is so defenceless that he has not a single relative in the country.

J. H. COLE.—The Royal Veterinary College is in Great College Street, Camden Town. It was founded in 1791, by M. Charles St. Bel, a French professor of the veterinary art, for the study of diseases incident to the horse, and for the improvement of farriery generally, and a pharmacy for medicine.

M. A. EYRON.—The opinion of the solicitors is bad. The widow should have administered, and taken her third, reserving the remaining two-thirds for her children. Even now as regards the two-thirds, she cannot alienate them from her family, or make an improper distribution.

G. HARRIS.—The people of these islands, especially the men, have degenerated, so far as stature is concerned, during the past century. About the time Culloden was fought, little men were the exception, and provoked ridicule; now they—that is, men under five feet eight inches—constitute the majority of the male population. It is the same throughout Europe, with the exception of Russia. In that country the men are tall and large-limbed, but deficient in muscular power. But in nerve, breadth and depth of chest, and all the essentials of a fine physique, the healthy, well-formed Englishman of the present day is perhaps superior to his progenitor of a century ago.

J. HASLAM.—Keeping your hat on in a school-room appropriated for the evening to dancing, was extremely rude. You should have left the room, if the draught annoyed you. An attention to these little civilities shows the true gentleman.

W. L. AND JOHN JONES.—According to the census of 1851, the population of the City of London was 120,702; of Liverpool, 282,666; of Glasgow, 257,592; and of Manchester, 240,367.

THOMAS H.—Copper coins were first introduced into England in the reign of James I. Previously, brass, tin, iron, and leather tokens were freely circulated.

AUNT CHLOE tells us a tale of local bigotry and foolish aiming at exclusiveness. She is a native of a certain place, which is partly supported by an oyster-fishery, belonging to a certain number of men whose parents took possession of the ground thirty years ago. They lived in a kind of community, if not of goods, at least of spirit—for it was almost a treasonable affair in the eyes of the young men—who, adds our correspondent, were awfully ignorant—for a girl to be courted by or married to a young man belonging to a town. The man was generally pelted with stones, and both annoyed by the most insulting and brutal treatment. Aunt Chloe married a townsman—a pious, respectable man—and he being regarded as an interloper, is treated after the orthodox fashion. Being a religious man, he is patient, and his wife feels for him, and solicits our advice. We can understand their position: they are assailed by that dark, blind spirit of savage selfishness which inflicts so much injury on this poor world of ours. Here we have a miserable example of high Toryism on the margin of an oyster-bed. The same thing occurs in towns, but is not so apparent. It is a principle common to the brute creation, and those of mankind who have been reared in ignorance and short-sightedness. It is the keep-him-out doctrine they worship. If Aunt Chloe will forward us all the particulars, we will endeavour to read this exclusive, non-reading, oyster-fishing community a strong, practical lesson, and in the meantime recommend her consideration the splendid line:

Time and patience wear out the longest day.

J. M'SYMOM.—A few months ago, Lord Aberdeen stated to a large and influential deputation, that if any of their number, connected with the shipping interest, were willing to convey letters across the ocean under the four-penny charge—for which the government proposed to perform the transit service between Great Britain and its colonies—he was sure the Post Office would gladly accept the offer. And since that declaration, Lord Canning has intimated the intention of the government to put up the conveyance of the mails to some of the colonies, to the competition of private enterprise. These official statements have been widely published in the United States, and have elicited offers from many companies to carry the letters at one penny sterling per letter; so that we should say ocean penny-postage is not only considered practicable by competent authorities, but that its realisation cannot be much longer deferred.

G. H.—Among the initiated in the mysteries of the language of flowers, the garden daisy expresses reciprocated attachment. When the mistress of a knight permitted him to have this flower engraved on his arms, it was a public avowal that she returned his love. The garden daisy is the double field-daisy. The latter is expressive of innocence. Oasian beautifully describes it as a flower "with golden disc, marked with rays of silver, tipped with a delicate tint of crimson. Waving amid the grass in a gentle breeze, it looks like a little child playing on the green meadow." The ancient English name of this flower was Day's Eye—in which way it was written by Ben Jonson; and Chaucer calls it the "oe of the dale"; Shakespeare apostrophises it as the flower—

Whose white vestments figure innocence.

As to your other question, we can only say that the custom of using flowers as symbols of the sentiments of the heart, is exclusively of oriental origin. Lady Mary Wortley Montague introduced a knowledge of the custom into this country; but in the ages of chivalry, colours were adopted by the knights—hence, red was highly esteemed as the colour of love, and, accordingly, the rose was, on account of its tint, a favourite emblem.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Rosabella G. R. (The public are tired of songs in praise of the "Greeks." There are no Greeks in the present day.)—James Wilson (Your sincerity is a virtue, but your opinions are adulterated by morbidness.)—John F. W. (We could not undertake to advise. You must trust a little to good luck, and everything to industry, energy, and tact.)—Michael O'O. (Back numbers, a month old and upwards, are three-halfpence each. "Not hungry!" repeated the boy; "that won't do. You've had nothing all day; everybody and everything le hung in this house! Do you know what people call it? Starvation Hall!"

"Finish your repast," said his young mistress, rising to leave the room; "and for the future I will see that you have proper food! It will be a fearful struggle!" she mentally added; "but I must be firm with him; and, after all, the money is my own!"

"Hard lines!" muttered Goliath; "very hard! she has forgotten the egg—but I won't remind her of it now! I do wish some one would wring the old man's neck, and marry his daughter! Marry her!" he slowly repeated, with the air of a person who suspects that, in the heat of the moment, he has gone too far; "no! I don't think I should like any one to marry Miss Alice!"

CHAPTER XII.

He has everything that an honest man
Should not have. What an honest man
Should have, he has nothing. SHAKESPEARE.

NED CANTOR, on his arrival in London, easily found out the residence of Lawyer Quirk's confidential clerk, who took him to his own lodgings, and kept him till the arrival of his principal in town—which was not till three or four days after the escape from the hall.

"Well, Ned," said the old gentleman, rubbing his hands, with an air of satisfaction, as soon as he saw his old acquaintance ushered into his private office, "how has Snake treated you?"

"Well enough!" replied the ruffian; "only he is such an infernal hypocrite: says grace before every meal, and wanted me to go to a prayer meeting, then talked to me about the sinfulness of my ways! What have his been, I should like to know?"

"Well, well, Ned!" replied Quirk, "we have all our little weaknesses, and Snake has his; he has an idea of doing everything respectably: it looks well in the head of an office like mine to be seen regularly at church! I raised his salary fifty pounds a year on that account alone!"

"Did you, though?" exclaimed Ned, with a stare of astonishment; "well, I should never have thought of that!"

"Most likely not!" replied the lawyer; "but now to business: have you been able to discover any clue to the lost children?"

"None!" answered the man, with an air of vexation; "and that is what has set me so hard against Mabel: it was all her folly!"

"Listen," interrupted Quirk, "to what I have to propose: the great probability is, that the infants have been taken by gipsies, or some of the numerous tramps that wander about the country! I will supply you with the means to go in search of them: the instant you discover where they are—"

"I'll take care of them!" said Ned.

"You will do nothing of the kind!" said the lawyer; "you must send for me—you understand?"

"Yes!" answered the ruffian, slowly.

"And will do as I direct?"

"Yes! that is, provided you mean no harm to little Meg! Look you, Mr. Quirk," he added, "I am a poor man, and I dare say a bad man, but Meg is my own flesh and blood—not a bit of her mother in her; I know I am in your power—that you could hang me if you pleased!"

"I certainly could!" quietly observed the old gentleman.

"And you might," added Ned, with a look of savage determination, "before I'd suffer you to harm a hair of my child's head!"

Quirk regarded the speaker for several minutes in silence: perhaps he was surprised to find so much human feeling in the degraded being before him, or speculating—for he was fond of abstruse calculations—the amount of resistance Ned's paternal affection would offer to a handsome bribe; for, like the poet, he had long since come to the conclusion, that all men have their price: the most worldly sell their feelings first—the best reserve them only till they have nothing else to part with.

"And what interest can I possibly have in harming her?" he at last made answer, with a smile. "No, Ned—no! I am one of those who keep as clear an account with heaven as is consistent with the weakness of our nature, and never commit even an equivocal action without first weighing the temptation!"

For once the man of law spoke the truth—he sinned on mathematical principles.

It was finally arranged that Ned should leave London on the following day—Quirk supplying him with the means; that he should traverse the country in various disguises, and communicate at regular intervals with the lawyer.

The affair being regulated to the lawyer's satisfaction, that very night he returned to the hall, in order to have the promised explanation, as he termed it, with Lady Briancourt, respecting the marriage of the baronet with his daughter.

In one of his calculations, at least, he was doomed to disappointment; but we must not anticipate which.

As Ned left the office of Mr. Quirk, in Serjeants' Inn, to his astonishment, more perhaps than satisfaction, he encountered his former companion in so many evil courses—Black Will: the fellow was dressed in the height, or rather the excess, of fashion. Making Cantor a sign to follow him, he darted down one of the narrow streets leading towards the Thames.

"So," he said, as soon as they had reached a spot where they were less liable to observation than in Fleet Street, "you have got off?"

"You see I have."

"How?" demanded Will, curiously.

"A friend!" replied Ned; "but no matter for that. How is it I find you in London, rigged out like any squire?"

"London, my dear boy," exclaimed Black Will, with an air of conceit, "is the only place for a man of talent! I was lost in the country—quite thrown away! I am glad I have met you—we can work together again! I want some one on whom I can really depend—such a plant?"

"A plant?"

"Yes," continued the young scamp—for he was little more than eighteen—"I have made the acquaintance of a goldsmith's assistant, and—but come," he added, "it's ill talking with dry lips. Let's drop into some house, where we can discuss our plans. Ned," he continued, surveying the dress of his friend with a critical air, "you really must get rigged out! I can never walk the streets of London with a man in a coat like that—it would disgrace me!"

"Would it!" replied his former pal, with a sneer; "perhaps my coat is better lined than yours!"

So saying, he pulled out the purse with the fifty sovereigns, which Quirk had given him on the night of the robbery and escape from the hall.

"What do you think of them?" he added.

Black Will smiled disdainfully, and opening his pocket-book, he displayed to the astonished Ned notes to the amount of at least two hundred pounds.

"Where did you get them?" he whispered.

"Where there are as many more to be obtained!" replied Will, "if you will only join me!"

The two worthies shook hands underneath the table, and the compact was as good as signed.

A day or two after the meeting between her husband and his former associate, Mabel, way-worn and fatigued, reached London—to the rich, gay, joyous, magnificent, glorious, crowded London; but to the poor—the stranger—cold, solitary London. Her first care was to inquire her way to Lombard Street, which she reached at last, and presented the letter which Miss Arden had given her to the wealthy goldsmith, who happened to be in the shop himself—his assistant having left on business.

"What is this, my good woman?" he said, without looking at the address. Doubtless, from the appearance of the bearer, he fancied it a petition.

"A letter, sir!"

"So I presume. But what is it about?"

"The young lady who gave it to me did not inform me of the contents. I must be right," she added, "for the same name is written on the address!"

Mr. Brindley broke the seal, and read the letter over a second time, as if to assure himself of the purport; and then, going to the till, he counted out twenty sovereigns to the astonished Mabel.

"There!" he said.

"For me, sir?"

"Yes!"

"No—there must be some mistake!" replied the bewildered woman; "all this money can never be for me!"

"Not for you!" repeated the merchant, carefully examining the features of the speaker, and then the signature of his correspondent's letter; "how came you by this note?"

"Miss Arden gave it to me, sir!"

"And your name is?"

"Mabel Cantor, sir!"

"Then the money is for you. I can comprehend your surprise," added the old gentleman, with a smile, "and admire your honesty! You cannot understand how the daughter of Nicholas Arden should possess the means of bestowing such a sum?"

"True, sir!"

"That is a secret between the young lady and myself; but you seem fatigued, my good woman!" said the goldsmith—for Mabel's joy had nearly overcome her; "step into the counting-house for a few minutes, and tell me how I can serve you."

The poor traveller did as she was requested. With infinite humility and modesty, she related the manner in which she had saved the life of Mr. Arden—making Ned's share in the transaction as light as possible—the loss of her child, and her determination, if possible, to discover it.

"Have you no clue?" demanded Mr. Brindley, who began to feel an interest in his visitor.

"None!" answered Mabel, with a sigh; "unless a mother's instinct."

"I fear it is a forlorn hope!" he said; "still it is one."

Further conversation was interrupted by the entrance of a customer into the shop, and the goldsmith left the counting-house to attend upon him himself, in the absence of his assistant.

Mabel started as she heard the voice of the man—for she knew it in an instant. Peeping cautiously over the blinds, she recognised Black Will, her husband's dissolute companion and associate. He was dressed as when Ned met him, and came to dispose of a small parcel of plate, doubtless the produce of some robbery. Presently Mr. Brindley returned. He came to look for some weights, to weigh the silver.

Although absent only for a few moments, those moments were quite long enough to answer the real purpose of his visitor; for no sooner had the merchant turned his back, than he thrust a lump of mastic into the wards of the lock of an immense iron safe, which stood directly opposite the window of the counting-house, hastily withdrew it, and placed it in his pocket. Little did the ruffian dream that the wife of his old comrade was watching him all the while.

Having received the price of the plate, Black Will left the shop with a swaggering air; and the goldsmith returned to his visitor, whose pale, agitated countenance struck him immediately.

"You are ill, my good woman!" he exclaimed; "very ill! Let me—"

"It is passed, sir!" interrupted Mabel. "You have been kind to me, and heaven never lets a good action go unrewarded!"

The old gentleman looked as if he did not comprehend her.

"Did you notice the man who just left your shop?" she continued.

"I did! What of him?"

"He was the companion of my husband on the night of the attempted robbery of Mr. Arden."

"You must mistake—his dress, his appearance!"

"I am not mistaken! I cannot be mistaken!" replied the woman; "he has caused me too much misery for that! His evil counsel and example it was that first corrupted my husband, whose natural disposition was far from wicked. While you were absent in the counting-house, I saw him thrust something into the lock of the great iron door opposite. I cannot tell what it was, for he withdrew it quickly, and hid it in his pocket."

Mr. Brindley, however, had a very shrewd idea of what it was; for, without uttering a word, he left the counting-house, and carefully examined the lock of the safe in which he was accustomed every night to secure the most valuable portion of his merchandise. On the sharp edge of the outward ward of the lock he detected a piece of wax. It was evident that an impression had been taken for the purpose of making a false key.

"Of what use would the key be," he naturally asked himself, "unless there were some one in the house to open the door of the shop?"

This set him thinking; but, being a very shrewd as well as benevolent person, he soon came to a conclusion, which after circumstances proved to be not very far from the truth.

"My good woman," he said, "you have rendered me a more important service than you imagine; and it is fitting that I prove my gratitude by something better than mere words. Where do you intend to fix your abode while you remain in London?"

"I cannot tell," replied Mabel. "I am a stranger here."

"In that case," continued the goldsmith, "remain with me; but breathe not a word to my housekeeper of what has transpired: not that I doubt her honesty," he added, "but her discretion. She is old and garrulous. Do you comprehend?"

"Perfectly, sir," answered his visitor, gratefully; "I cannot tell what Black Will intends, but I am certain he means no good!"

The old gentleman rang the bell twice, and in a few moments the housekeeper—a very talkative old lady, who had been in his service upwards of thirty years—made her appearance.

"Susan," said her master, "you will provide a bedroom for this person for a few days. She has brought me a letter from my niece, Alice Arden."

"Would Miss Alice had come herself!" replied the domestic. "Poor young lady! her life must be a sad one with her father!"

"Hush, Susan!" exclaimed the old gentleman, reprovingly; "remember that Mr. Arden is her father!"

With that half-familiar, half-respectful air which all old servants feel themselves privileged to use, the housekeeper retired from the counting-house, followed by the weary Mabel.

Three nights afterwards, Black Will, Ned Cantor, and the goldsmith's assistant were detected by the City officers in an attempt to rob the shop of the master of the latter, and committed to Newgate for trial. Had the robbery been accomplished, nothing could have saved them from the gallows. As it was, they were sentenced, to the horror and grief of Mabel, to fourteen years' transportation for the attempt—which circumstance delayed for several months the search of the mother for her lost child.

CHAPTER XIII.

You are a vagabond, and no true traveller. You are more saucy with lords and honourable personages than the heraldry of your birth and virtues gives you commission. SHAKESPEARE.

THE morning after the arrival of Quirk at the hall, he requested an interview with Lady Briancourt, which was immediately granted. What passed was known only to themselves—but it must have been a stormy one; for the lawyer's countenance was extremely pale when he descended to the library, where Sir Charles was anxiously awaiting his appearance.

"Well," said the baronet, "have you informed my mother of my marriage?"

"I have!"

"And how did she hear it?"

"Like most women who are proud and passionate," answered his father-in-law, "when they hear intelligence which is distasteful to them: stormed, raved, and vowed that she would never see or acknowledge you again."

"You have ruined me!" hastily interrupted his client.

"Pshaw!" resumed the old man, with a smile; "I never proceed but on sure reasons, and her ladyship must have been difficult to convince, indeed, if she had not listened to mine! I appealed, of course, to her maternal feelings—painted your passion for my daughter, whose beauty, virtues, and accomplishments—to say nothing of the fortune she will inherit when I die—merit her elevation; but the consideration which chiefly moved her," he added, "was the existence of a grandson—the heir of her proud name. She quite longs to embrace him!"

"Does she?" answered the baronet, with a look of incredulity.

"Almost reproached me or having so long concealed his birth!"

"Quirk! Quirk!"

"And, as a proof of her maternal satisfaction at your happiness," concluded the wily lawyer, "your mother consents at once to resign to you the rents of Broadlands, and content herself with the jointure upon your estates."

"You must have dealt with the devil," exclaimed the astonished Sir Charles, "to have wrought Lady Briancourt to this! She has been laughing at you," he continued; "and you, with all your penetration, could not see it!"

"Lady Briancourt did not laugh!" observed the lawyer, seriously; "in fact, she is not much given to mirth!"

"I tell you you have ruined me!" added his son-in-law.

"Ruin comes, then, in a very pleasing form!" replied Mr. Quirk; "since it brings you an accession of twelve thousand a year! My dear Charles," he added—for the first time using so familiar an expression—"the matters stand just as I have explained them. You will first see the dowager, and then set out for London."

"London! For what purpose?"

"To escort your wife, Lady Briancourt, and your son, to the hall!" replied the old man, in a tone of triumph. "The acknowledgment can and shall no longer be delayed! Your mother is satisfied, I am satisfied—why should not you be?"

There was a gentle tap at the door of the library. It was Miss Tubby, with a message from her lady, desiring to see Sir Charles in her own room immediately.

"You hear!" whispered the lawyer, with a smile upon his thin, sneering lips.

"How is my mother?" inquired the baronet.

"Doing!" answered the Abigail, furiously. "That wretch"—pointing to Quirk—"has killed her!"

Sir Charles waited to hear no more, but rushed from the library, to seek the chamber of his parent. Miss Tubby was about to follow, when Quirk seized her by the wrist, and dragged her from the door.

"What do you mean?" exclaimed the angry woman, struggling to release herself; "would you murder me?"

"I never do such things! I am too prudent, Sarah!" answered the old man; "for murder is a crime which the legislature wisely punishes by death—by hanging! Did you ever see any one executed?"

"Never!" almost shrieked the waiting-woman; "never!"

"The next time such a thing takes place at Chelmsford," continued the lawyer, "I would advise you to go—it might improve you! First, there is the scaffold in front of the prison—then the sea of heads—thousands of faces turned towards the criminal, who stands under the beam, while the hangman fixes the rope! It must be a shocking feeling, Sarah—the first grasp of the hangman's hand upon the naked neck—especially of a woman! How the nerves must quiver! Next," he continued, with a leer, "the cap is drawn over the eyes—the bolt drawn, and the wretch swings like a scarecrow in the wind!"

"For pity's sake, how can you terrify me so? Let me go, I say! Pray let me go!"

"There!" said Quirk, releasing her; "I have no wish to detain you! Why should I, when I always know where to find you? But for the future, Miss Tubby, a little more respect will be necessary towards your master's father-in-law!"

"Yes, sir!" answered the woman, submissively.

"That will do—you may go!" added the gentleman; "but do not compel me to repeat the lesson!"

"I will not, sir!" answered the Abigail, as she staggered rather than walked out of the room—her tormentor regarding her with a quiet smile; for he felt perfectly satisfied that henceforth she would be as pliant and respectful as he wished.

"Pshaw!" he said, with an air of contempt. "A likely thing, truly, that, after having tamed the lioness, I should submit to be snarled at by this she-jackal!"

So saying, he seated himself at the table, and wrote a long letter to his daughter, informing her of the éclaircissement which had taken place. For the first time he addressed her as Lady Briancourt—and the ambitions, shrivelled thing he called his heart, beat with pride and exultation at the triumph he had achieved.

When Sir Charles entered the dressing-room of Lady Briancourt, he found her, contrary to his expectation, calm and serious. True, her lips quivered when she addressed him, but there was neither passion nor reproach in her words, which were few and brief; the occasional flash of her dark eye alone betrayed the internal struggle to subdue herself.

"Mother—dear mother!" he exclaimed; "do you really forgive me?"

"Yes."

The look of loathing and contempt which accompanied the word, gave the lie to the affirmation, but the baronet did not see it. He was hypocritically kissing her unresisting hand.

"The joy—the gratitude!" he muttered, "the devotion of my life!"

"No words!" interrupted her ladyship, in the same unpassioned tone; "I know their value! You had better at once announce your marriage, and the birth of your son—the heir of your name! Of course," she added, his dear grandfather has taken due care that not a doubt should exist, either of the validity of his daughter's marriage, or the boy's legitimacy?"

"None, mother—none!"

"That is fortunate—very fortunate!" she continued; "that done, you will bring your wife—the new Lady Briancourt—to the hall, introduce her to your friends—the families of the county! The—there Charles—go, go! you need no advice from me—your father-in-law will instruct you—bring them home at once!"

Fearful lest she should no longer be able to control the real feelings which consumed her, she motioned to her son to leave the dressing-room; and the baronet, conscious of the unworthy light in which he must appear before her, hastened to obey her.

"Something connected with Clara's husband!" he mentally exclaimed, as he left the room; "nothing less could have given Quirk such a hold upon her!"

It was true that the lawyer had been employed by her ladyship to lure George Stanley from England, under the promise of an appointment in a distant colony: which promise, it is needless to say, was never fulfilled. But it was not that which gave him such influence over her.

To the great astonishment of all who were acquainted with the family, the announcement that Sir Charles Briancourt had been married for five years, appeared not only in the London, but all the country papers. It was followed by the certificate, as well as that of the birth of a son and heir, named Phineas, after his grandfather, Phineas Quirk, Esq., the celebrated conveyancer and solicitor.

Whatever other comments might be made, there were none on the propriety of the lady's conduct; for the licence by which the ceremony had been performed was a special one, and the dates, both of the marriage and the birth of the child, must have satisfied the most censorious.

Two days after these double events had been made public, the baronet and his father-in-law started for London, in order to escort the wife and child of the former to their future home.

From the window of her ladyship's dressing-room, Sarah Tubby and her mistress witnessed their departure, which was evidently a relief to both.

"Thank heaven, they are gone!" observed the Abigail. "That horrid lawyer—he nearly frightened me out of my wits! Were I in your place, my lady," she added, "I would rather everything should be known, than live the slave of that man!"

"I shall never live the slave of any one!" was the calm reply.

"Besides," continued the woman, "to give up Broadlands, and all the family diamonds! That I should live to see Lawyer Quirk's daughter wear the Briancourt jewels!"

"She never will wear them!" answered her mistress, passionately. "I am surprised, Sarah, that you should have been deceived! I thought at least you knew me better! The blow I deal is felt—not seen! Send Barnes to me!"

With a bewildered air her confidante left the room, to summon the house-steward, assured that her mistress had taken some desperate resolution—for Lady Briancourt avoided, as far as possible, all communication with the old man, whom she appeared to fear, as well as hate.

"I am punished!" murmured the mother of the unfortunate Clara. "My sin has found me! Hitherto I have sinned through pride—henceforth my life shall be devoted to atonement! Broadlands, my father's inheritance—that is their aim; but I will disappoint the avarice of the unnatural wretch who calls himself my son, and the villain who has schooled him! Living or dead, I possess the power to baffle their cupidity! But," she added, with a sigh of bitter anguish, "at what a price!"

The door of the dressing-room opened, and the confidential servant of her late husband made his appearance, calm and collected, as usual.

"So, Barnes," exclaimed her ladyship, as soon as he had closed the door, "you have heard the news?"

The old man nodded, to intimate that he had.

"Your suspicions are confirmed!" continued the speaker. "The fatal letter which you so long and obstinately refused to give up to me, has fallen into the hands of that pettifogging rascal, Quirk!"

"I was sure it had!" answered the house-steward, without betraying the least emotion; "and the fool thinks he has you in his power?"

A deep flush of anger and shame suffused the cheek of Lady Briancourt, as she answered in the affirmative.

"I see it all," continued Barnes, with a smile; "hence the avowal of your son's marriage with his daughter. Well, the punishment is just!"

"Just!" exclaimed the lady, in accents of strong passion. "Just! You tell me so! You, who know how deeply I have been outraged—wronged on the point where woman's honour is most vulnerable!"

"Wronged," repeated the old man, "and avenged!"

"True," said his mistress, sinking into her chair, and hiding her face in her hands; "fearfully but righteously avenged!"

"And what is it you propose to do?" he demanded.

"Leave this place!" answered Lady Briancourt, in a decided tone. "They would take Broadlands! My son—for whom I have sinned—and his sharp-witted father-in-law, would rob me of my inheritance, and leave me to depend upon my jointure! You know its value!"

"And when you have left?" added Mr. Barnes.

Lady Briancourt approached him, and whispered a few words in his ear. The effect was electrical—for the hitherto impassible countenance of the house-steward became animated with an expression of respect and sympathy.

"Right!" he said; "and I will assist you!"

"And accompany me?" inquired his mistress.

"No—follow you, madam!" answered the old man, respectfully; "your departure must not be delayed an instant! The family diamonds can be taken with you.

The plate, which is yours for life, I will see to the rest; you may trust to my arrangement!"

That same evening, to the astonishment of the household, Lady Briancourt, attended by Sarah Tubby and Mr. Barnes, started in a chaise-and-four for London. The latter personage, however, could only have gone part of the way to see his mistress on her journey—for, at an early hour the following morning, he made his appearance at the Hall.

The day at last arrived on which Sir Charles Briancourt was to return from town with his wife and heir: the tenantry had been duly summoned by the agent of the estate, to welcome and congratulate their landlord. On his arrival, a bonfire was made upon Lexden Heath, and an ox roasted whole in the park; but the affair passed off coldly. The baronet had never been really popular with his farmers, and the recollection of his treatment of the unhappy Clara was fresh in their minds. There is a natural sentiment of justice in the human mind which revolts at cruelty and heartlessness. The carriage drew up at the principal entrance to the hall, where Barnes, Mrs. Brandon, and the household were assembled to greet their new mistress—who appeared abashed at her elevation—and the party alighted.

"Where is my mother?" demanded their master, looking anxiously around.

The house-steward placed a letter in his hand, at the same time casting a satirical glance at Lawyer Quirk, who, radiant with smiles, had been holding up his grandson to the tenantry, as they drove through the park.

"Here is something to lessen your mirth!" exclaimed the baronet, thrusting the letter he had just received into his hand. "I told you you had ruined me!"

The communication from his mother ran thus:

"Charles,—you have deceived me, and degraded yourself, by a marriage with the daughter of that old villain, Quirk. The Broadlands shall neither be yours nor your son's inheritance; and my dower from the Briancourt estates I shall exact to the last shilling. The family jewels are in my possession, and I have given directions to remove the plate. Farewell—it is not my intention that we should ever meet again. Inquiry will be useless—my measures are too securely taken for you to discover my abode. Your deeply outraged mother,

"CLARA BRIANCOURT."

"Pooh!" exclaimed the lawyer, with a sneer; "I will discover her in three days!"

He was mistaken—years elapsed without his being able to obtain the least clue to the retreat of Lady Briancourt, who kept her word: her bankers in London received the rents of Broadlands—under a power of procuration, which they produced—as well as her dower from the estates of her late husband; nor could any inducement Quirk or his son-in-law held out, ever wring from them the secret of her abode.

The consequence was, that Sir Charles remained a poorer man than ever; his wife—whom he neglected and despised, on account of the baseness of her origin, and her having been forced upon him by his manœuvring father-in-law—wretched and discontented—her rank a mere burthen to her. In fact, so unwilling were the families of the county to associate with or receive her, that it was only on very rare occasions she could make her appearance in public—and even then her husband seldom condescended to accompany her.

The consequence of this ill-assorted marriage was, that the baronet—who had lost his seat in Parliament—after two years of humiliation and disgust, passed at the family seat, resolved upon taking a tour on the continent: which resolution, to the great mortification of Quirk, he put into practice, having first removed his wife, Master Phineas, and the boy's tutor—the Rev. Ebenezer Sneak—to a sort of hunting-box which he possessed on the borders of Windsor Forest.

Briancourt Manor was let for seven years, to the great satisfaction of the neighbouring gentry, most of whom had known and loved the gentle, persecuted Clara. Go where he would, cold eyes were turned upon him, and the heartless brother was punished by that moral reprobation with which society marks its abhorrence of crimes that the law cannot reach.

One evening, shortly after their arrival at The Retreat—such was the name of the lodge—Master Phineas and his tutor were walking, towards the close of a fine evening in summer, in the village which adjoined the lodge leading to the house, when their attention was excited by a tall, Bardolph-like looking man, attired with that semi-genteel, devil-may-care, knock-me-off style, which distinguishes the itinerant members of the histrionic profession. He was addressing the crowd of gaping rustics who had gathered round him, expatiating on the merits of two beautiful children—girls—apparently twins—and certainly not more than six years of age, who, dressed in a fanciful theatrical costume, were standing by his side.

The little dancers were both equally dark and interesting. There was a likeness between them, arising more, perhaps, from general characteristics than positive similarity of feature; but the expression of their countenances was widely different.

One met the gaze of the crowd with a bold, confident look, whilst the other, with intuitive delicacy, appeared to shrink from it. It was this peculiarity which had induced their worthy parent and instructor—who had been expatiating on their professional merits—to call them May-beam and Violet. Certain the names could not have been more appropriately bestowed: the first was all fire and courage, regarding the world boldly in the face, like a thing it knew and scorned; the other sought, like her modest namesake, to avoid the vulgar gaze—happy only in obscurity.

"I have the honour of presenting to this distinguished, enlightened, and discriminating audience," said the mountebank, with that ready fluency which characterises his profession, "the twin phenomena, Mademoiselle Maybeam and her sister, Mademoiselle Violet, the first dancers in the world, from the Grand Opera de Paris! Many will doubtless be surprised," he added, "that prodigies of such excellent talent should choose this method of making themselves known to fame; but genius is above prejudice! Theopis acted in a car—Kean in a barn—Homer recited his Iliad in the streets—and I, Alexander Georgium Sidus Mont Athos"—here the itinerant made a low bow, by way of introducing himself to his audience—"prefer the free air of the streets to the stifling atmosphere of the playhouse. We make no charge—but trust to the generosity of a discriminating public!"

"Oh, do stop and see the mountebanks!" exclaimed Master Phineas to his tutor; "it is so very amusing!"

"Not now, my dear," answered the reverend gentleman; "mamma will be waiting for us."

"Let her wait!" replied the spoiled boy, petulantly; "I will stay and see them—if you don't like to stop, you can go home! Grandfather pays you," added the child, disdainfully; "to teach me, not to govern me: so if you don't like to see them, I do!"

The reverend gentleman looked as if he would very much like to have boxed the ears of his pupil, but dared not.

"Certainly, my dear," he said; "if you particularly wish it."

"I do wish it, and will stay!" was the ungracious reply.

By this time the father of the twin prodigies, as he styled them, had drawn a small kit from his capacious pocket, and commenced playing an air, to which the two children danced with much natural grace. The rude country-people, with their children, who had gathered round, were loud in their applause; and at the termination of the dance rewarded them with a shower of half-pence. It was Violet's turn to collect the offerings: when she approached the spot where the clergyman and his pupil were standing, the latter, impelled by his natural love of mischief, struck the little hand she extended towards him sharply, with his cane. The child uttered an exclamation of pain, and let fall the little bag containing the offerings. No sooner did Maybeam perceive the outrage offered to her, than she dashed to her assistance, wrenched the cane from the hands of the little tyrant, and beat him with it, amid shouts of approbation from the assembled mob.

Unfortunately for the itinerant, the beadle at this moment made his appearance. Like most of his vocation, he was imbued with an immense idea of the importance of his office, a profound contempt for poverty in any shape, and a corresponding respect, amounting almost to adoration, for the rich and great.

"Why, you little viper!" he exclaimed, rudely seizing Maybeam by the arm, and wrenching the stick from her hand; "a porpus vagrant like you to dare strike the son of a real barrowite! What will the world come to?"

"He beat my sister!" said the child, fiercely.

"And if he did," answered the pompous official, "she ought to have been proud of such a mark of condescension! The dear young gentleman! Are you much hurt, sir?" he added, addressing Master Phineas.

"Yes!" blubbered the spiteful urchin; "put her in prison!"

"I will!" said the beadle, attempting to drag her away.

"Base churl!" cried Alexander Georgium Sidus Mont Athos; "wouldst rob a doating father of his child?"

"What does the mad vagrum mean by robbing?" demanded the parish official, not in the least comprehending the inflated style of speaking used by the itinerant.

"I spoke hyperbolically."

"Diabolically, you mean, you ignorant rascal!" said the man of authority, interrupting him; "howsumdover, I hasn't been beadle for thirty years, without knowing how to deal with such characters as you: so come along with you!"

Without further ceremony, the speaker laid his broad hand upon the collar of the mountebank, and, despite his protestations and assertions that he was patronised by his majesty and the whole of the royal family, declared his intention of putting him in the stocks. The fellow, like most jacks in office, was glad of an occasion of displaying his little brief authority; perhaps, too, he felt that it would be imprudent to punish Maybeam for defending her sister—several of the villagers having called out to him that the boy struck the little dancer first, and desired him to let her go.

Despite his resistance, the mountebank was forced from the scene where he had lately harangued the mob, who followed, delighted at the idea of witnessing the sport.

The terrified and weeping children crept after them, at a short distance.

"Come along!" said Master Phineas to his tutor, "and let's see the fun!" For he delighted in witnessing anything which inflicted pain upon a fellow-creature.

"Courage!" whispered Maybeam to her sister, as they stood at a short distance from the scene, regarding their affectionate parent in the stocks; "dad doesn't mind it! It won't last long—not more than an hour!"

"He will beat us!" replied Violet, with a shudder.

"Not you!" said the little girl, throwing her arm around her; "I'll take it for both! Perhaps," she added, "they will put him in prison."

"Prison! What will become of us, then?" sobbed Violet.

"I will take care of you, my dear!" replied a coarse-looking woman, who for the last hour had been intently watching them, and had gradually crept towards the spot where they were standing. "This way—this way!"

The sisters looked at each other, and hesitated; but the angry glances which the infuriated mountebank from time to time cast on them, as the cause of his disgrace, decided them, and they slowly followed the speaker.

THE MOTHER.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

A SOFTENING thought of other years

A feeling link'd to hours

When Life was all too bright for tears,—

And Hope sang, wreath'd with flowers!

A memory of affections fled—

Of voices—heard no more!—

Stirred in my spirit when I read

That name of fondness o'er!

Oh Mother!—in that early word

What loves and joys combine;

What hopes—too oft, alas!—defer'd;

What vigils—griefs—are thine!—

Yet, never, till the hour we roam—

By worldly thralls oppress,

Learn we to prize that truest home—

A watchful mother's breast!

The thousand prayers at midnight pour'd

Beside our couch of woes;

The wasting weariness endured

To soften our repose!—

Whilst never murmur mark'd thy tongue—

Nor toils relaxed thy care:—

How, Mother, is thy heart so strong

To pity and forbear?

What filial fondness e'er repaid

Or could repay the past?—

Alas! for gratitude decay'd!

Regrets that rarely last!—

'Tis only when the dust is thrown

Thy lifeless bosom o'er;

We muse upon thy kindness shown—

And wish we'd loved thee more!

'Tis only when thy lips are cold—

We mourn with late regret,

'Mid myriad memories of old—

The days for ever set!

And not an act—nor look—nor thought—

Against thy meek control,

But with a sad remembrance fraught

Wakes anguish in the soul!

On every land—in every clime—

True to her sacred cause,

Fill'd by that effluence sublime

From which her strength she draws,

Still is the Mother's heart the same—

The Mother's lot as tried:

Then, oh! may Nations guard that name

With filial power and pride!

OLD THINGS MADE NEW.

WE see that an attempt is being made to revive the doctrine of "Transfusion." According to the advocates of this philosophy, the only reason men and other animals become debilitated, is because their blood has become old, and lacks vigour. To bring about perpetual youth, all that is required, they say, is to re-furnish our system every now and then with young blood. The doctrine of transfusion took its rise shortly after Harvey demonstrated the circulation of the blood. This philosopher laboured thirty years before he could induce the physicians of Europe to believe that blood had motion, and that the heart was made for some other purpose besides fluttering at the sight of a petticoat or chemisette. Harvey spent half a lifetime in making a truth popular, which required the labour of almost another life to prevent being carried to excess. The moment the circulation was admitted, a sort of delirium seems to have seized upon the profession; it was supposed that the means of curing all diseases, and rendering man immortal, were discovered. The causes of all our diseases were attributed to the blood. To cure them, therefore, nothing more was supposed to be required than to remove the bad blood, and to replace it with that which was pure, taken from a healthy animal.

The first attempts were made upon animals, and were very successful. A dog, having lost a large quantity of blood, received by transfusion the blood of a sheep, and was perfectly restored; another dog, old and deaf, recovered by these means the use of his hearing, and seemed to renew his youth. A horse, twenty-six years old, having received into his veins the blood of four lambs, acquired new vigour. The experiment of transfusion was now tried upon man. Denys and Emerez, the one a physician, and the other a surgeon, of Paris, were the first who made the attempt. They introduced into the veins of an insane young man, the blood of a calf, in a larger quantity than had been taken from him: he recovered his reason. A case of leprosy, and a quartan fever, were cured by these means; and many cases of transfusion were tried upon men in health, without any injurious results.

But some sad accidents soon calmed the general enthusiasm excited by these few successful experiments. The young man, soon after the experiment, became frantic; he was the second time subjected to transfusion, and soon died with a discharge of blood, and in a state of stupor. A prince of the blood-royal having also fallen a victim to this practice, it was forbidden by the Parliament of Paris. A short time afterwards, G. Riva, having performed the operation of transfusion upon two individuals who died in Italy, the Pope forbade it. From that period, transfusion has been considered not only useless, but dangerous; but as it seems to have succeeded in some cases, it would be an interesting inquiry, for a person skilled in such experiments, to pursue the subject further.

Magendie, in speaking of the matter, says:

"I have had occasion to make a certain number of these experiments, but have never known any instance where the introduction of the blood of one animal into the veins of another was attended by any serious inconvenience, even when the quantity of blood thus introduced was much greater than before. But in order that the transfusion may be made without inconvenience, it is necessary that the blood should be passed immediately from the animal that gives to that which receives it. If the blood be first received into a vessel or syringe, and afterwards injected, it will be more or less coagulated, and often becomes the cause of death, by choking up the pulmonary vessels. All the experiments where this circumstance is not taken into account, have little value. I have seen the transfusion fail, and cause death, because the blood had to traverse a small tube two inches long, where it partly coagulated, before passing into the new circulation."

THE PROJECTED INVASION OF ENGLAND BY NAPOLEON, IN 1804.

THE following extracts from "Thiers' History of the Consulate and Empire" will inform us that the British government were not deceived in regard to the information which was conveyed to them from France, as well in 1803, as also in the two following years: "Napoleon had resolved very speedily to execute his grand enterprise. He wished to cross the Straits in the month of July or August, 1804; and if the incredulous, who have questioned the reality of this project, could read his private correspondence with the ministers of marine, the infinite number of his orders, the secret communication of his hopes to the Arch-Chancellor Cambacères, they would no longer entertain any doubt as to the reality of that extraordinary resolution." "Napoleon received at Boulogne the melancholy intelligence of the death of Latouche Treville, commander of the Toulon fleet, at the moment when prepared to embark, August, 1804." With reference to the next year, the same publication proceeds to inform us, that "Napoleon arrived at Boulogne on the 3d of August, 1805: on the very morrow of his arrival, he had all his infantry mustered on the shore at low-water mark. These occupied above three leagues, and presented the enormous mass of one hundred thousand infantry, drawn up in a single line. In the evening he wrote these significant words to Admiral Decrès: 'The English know not what awaits them. If we have the power of crossing for but twelve hours, England is no more.' It is at the time when no panic exists, that calm reflections on antecedent periods of history may be formed with the best effect; and when we view fortresses once impregnable, now, from the progress of science, untenable for a single hour, it well becomes those who are intrusted with the destinies of an empire, to consider whether the provisions for national defence have kept pace with the new exigencies which arise."

THE EXERCISE OF THE MENTAL FACULTIES.—The pursuits of literature, politics, or commerce, are often of so exciting a kind, that in place of the powers of the mind being exercised, they are too often overtaxed and fatigued. Honour, power, or praise acquired, stimulates to increased exertion; the ardent student, the ambitious politician, the eager merchant, forgetting all but the one object before them, labour and labour on; having recourse to artificial stimuli to recruit the wearied powers, taking no amusement, neglecting to take bodily exercise in the open air, until gradually dyspepsia, sleeplessness, and other ailments supervene, the mind becomes less vigorous, the memory less retentive, the perception less acute, the judgment less accurate, and a gradually increasing imbecility of mind and weakness of body compel the abandonment of those pursuits which, if they had been more wisely followed, might have led to fortune, fame, and honourable distinction. It is especially in the meridian of life, when the mental powers are perhaps most fully developed and demand to be most actively employed, when the mind is really capable of so much, that there seems no limit to its capabilities—it is then this fatal error of over-taxation, of too continuous labour, is most common. But let the man of superior genius, learning, or talent, pause well, ere he thus wears out the great gifts with which Providence has endowed him; let him remember that his duty to all mankind, no less than to himself, calls on him to preserve his great powers in their integrity for many years, not sacrifice them in a few; and how may they thus be preserved? Simply by not over-taxing them, by systematising their exertion, by allowing the mind periods of relaxation from deep thought and laborious exertion, by alternating pursuits of a less serious and exciting character, or even by joining in amusing frivolities. The relaxation of the mental powers must be found not in merely resting, in merely quitting for a time the absorbing and fatiguing employment, but in change to some other less severe occupation; for if no new occupation be entered upon, the mind still dwells on the old one, and ponders again and again on what has been done, and what remains to do.

[SCENE AT SMITHFIELD BARS.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER LII.

And yet this tough, impracticable heart
Is governed like a dainty-fingered girl's:
Such flaws are found in the most worthy natures.
OLD PLAY.

In the midst of her graver occupations of governing the kingdom, Elizabeth displayed a childish tenacity regarding everything which affected her own royal person. Dress, with her, was a matter of state. In imitation of the sovereign, the wives not only of the nobility, but the richer class of citizens, disfigured themselves by the immense ruff which gives so peculiar a character to the portraits of the time. This was a liberty which the maiden queen resented, and parliament, at her desire, passed a law, appointing officers, named for that purpose, to stand at the corners of the streets, armed with shears, to cut down all ruffs to the prescribed standard, as well as to clip the swords of the gentry, which began to be worn of a most preposterous length.

This law occasioned much discontent amongst the citizens and their wives; as for the nobility, they generally contrived to escape it; but the chief obloquy fell upon those who were charged with its execution. One of their principal stations in the City was at the Bars of Smithfield, which presented a very different appearance from the Smithfield of the present day: it being frequented by the higher classes, for the purpose of exercise. Solemn occasions and tournaments were held there, also bull and bear baiting, for the amusement of the people.

At the bars—a sort of moveable barricade at the entrance to Smithfield—sat Jasper Kevering and Anthony Frimby, the two officers charged with the execution of her majesty's new law: one held in his hand a measure something like an ell wand, upon which was marked the prescribed length of the gentlemen's rapiers; the other, an instrument made of iron, with a fork at the end—which said fork was intended to fix upon the shoulders of the ladies: the handle, or piece rising from the centre, indicated the height of ruff which it was permitted to wear. Each had an enormous pair of iron shears dangling by a chain from his side.

As it was the first day of the new law coming into operation, a crowd of idlers, consisting of City 'prentices—at all times a troublesome class—scrivener's clerks, serving-men, and petty traders, had assembled at the barriers to witness the sport, and jeer at or condole with the victims, as caprice or sympathy inclined them. This mob—for such it speedily became—was augmented by the number of those who had already suffered, most of whom thought fit to remain, and assure themselves that the officials executed justice impartially.

"Well," observed an old woman, whose ruff of Flanders lace had been unmercifully reduced, "this is a new thing in England! What shall we have next, I wonder?"

"A law, mother," replied a pert apprentice, "to measure the women's tongues as well as their ruffs; and those which are found too long will be clipped!"

A hearty laugh followed this sally.

"Stay!" cried the female; "here comes the rich clothier, Alderman Parley, and his daughter Rebecca. Now we shall see whether there is one law for the poor and another for the rich!"

"Now then, Master Frimby," shouted the mob, "do your duty!"

"No favour, Jasper Kevering!"

As the City functionary and his daughter—who were both mounted on a dark-roan-coloured Flemish horse, the lady on a pillion behind her father, as was the fashion in those days—approached the bars, the two officers advanced, and in the queen's name commanded them to halt.

"And what," said the alderman—a bustling, important-looking personage—"does her Majesty want with us? Do you not see," he added, touching his gold chain, "who I am!"

"The law," replied the two officers, "knows no distinction; so please you, worthy sir, and my young mistress, to descend."

"We are very well where we are," said the wealthy dealer in broad-cloth. "Tut, tut, man—the law was never intended to apply to the mayor and aldermen of the City, who are in some sort sovereigns within their own bounds! You should use more discretion in your office!"

The two men hesitated, for the speaker was a most important personage in the City. The crowd, seeing that they were disposed to show him and his daughter favour, began to hoot and hiss. Some cried shame—amongst the latter the city 'prentices were the most vociferous: many of them had frequently experienced the severity of the alderman, when brought before him by their masters for ill-doing.

This ebullition of popular feeling decided the two men to perform their duty: firmly, but respectfully, they called upon the recusants once more to dismount; adding, that in case of further resistance, they should be compelled to call the City guard—a party of whom, leaning upon their partisans, were looking on, amused spectators of the scene.

With an ill grace, the alderman dismounted from his steed, and assisted his daughter to alight. This act of submission was followed by a clapping of hands, and repeated shouts of "Bravo Kevering! Bravo Master Frimby!"

"Your sword, worthy sir," said the former, whose peculiar duty it was to measure the rapiers.

Alderman Parley presented it, muttering at the same time something about the privileges of the City.

"Too long by four inches," said the officer, after carefully measuring the weapon, "according to the standard."

And without a word, he broke it off to the required length.

"Now, my young mistress!" began his colleague, advancing to the lady, with his iron instrument, which he attempted to place upon her shoulder; "I am fearful that Mechlin ruff must fall under my shears!"

Mechlin! what female, however loyally disposed, could have endured patiently the destruction of a real Mechlin ruff? And, judging from appearances, Miss Rebecca Parley was not the Griselda of her sex. She screamed and resisted, daring the fellow to lay a hand upon her person, and called lustily upon her father to commit the fellow to prison. The worthy clothier, however, was too prudent to venture on such a step with two of the queen's officers, even if he could have prevailed on the City guard to have obeyed him—a circumstance exceedingly doubtful.

"Never mind, child!" exclaimed her parent. "Thou shalt have the best old Godman's shop will afford! We must 'e'en submit; but the affair will not end here!"

"There!" said the girl, tearing the ruff from her neck, and tossing it, with an indignant air, to the officer; "measure, and cut, and clip it as ye will; but no lewd, filthy fellow, were he twenty times the queen's officer, shall lay a finger on the person of Rebecca Parley! Her majesty should be ashamed," she added, "and so she ought, to permit such an outrage upon the modesty of her own sex. A pretty recompense for all the City have done to support and pleasure her!"

As there was no further question of dispute between the alderman and the officers, the former, after assisting his daughter to her pillion, mounted his horse, and rode off, amid the jeers of the mob—most of whom were rejoiced to see his well-known pride and arrogance thus humbled.

The commotion had barely subsided, when a grave-looking personage, richly dressed, followed by several servants on horseback, approached the bars. He wore a very long rapier, the belt of which was richly damasked, and curiously inlaid with gold. He was evidently a person of condition.

Kevering and Frimby, after having exercised their office upon the august persons of an alderman and his daughter, felt themselves courageous enough to measure the sword of the great Cham of Tartary himself, backed, as they were, by the guard and public opinion. The former advanced as he had previously done, and commanded the stranger, in the queen's name, to dismount.

"Eh, pourquoi?" demanded the gentleman, in French.

Foreigners happened at this time to be highly unpopular in the City, particularly Frenchmen. This was partly arising from the rumour spread abroad, that Elizabeth had renewed the treaty of marriage between herself and the Duke D'Anjou; but still more so from that innate antipathy between the two races, which appears an instinct rather than a passion.

"Clip the Mounseer's toasting-fork!" they shouted; "it is at least six inches longer than the law permits! Clip it—clip it! Ah, no favour to the French frog!"

The gentleman, seeing that speaking his native tongue procured him so much disfavour, carried on the rest of the conversation in English, which he spoke with great fluency, though not without that peculiar accent which distinguishes the foreigner.

"And pray, gentlemen," he said, with the most exquisite politeness, "what can her majesty require of me?"

"You know the law, sir," replied Jasper Kevering, "touching the wearing of swords?"

"I do! At least I have heard of some such thing!"

"You must resign your weapon, sir, to be broken to the required length," continued Jasper Kevering.

The countenance of the stranger flushed with indignation. Drawing his rapier, he threatened to plunge it into the body of the first who should attempt to pollute it by a touch; and called loudly on his servants to second him.

It now became high time for the City guards to interfere. Levelling their partisans, they prepared to charge the gentleman and his party, amid the cheers of the mob, who were delighted with the prospect of an affray, when Lord Seymour, who happened to be riding in the same place, dashed his horse between the two parties, exclaiming, as he did so:

"Back, knaves! respect the ambassador of France!"

The gentleman who had so gallantly resisted the ridiculous law of the maiden queen, was no other than Mauvissière de Castelnau, the representative of the French King at the court of England. He had doubtless endured much in order to facilitate the grand scheme of Catherine De Medici, to bring about an union between her son and Elizabeth—but there was a limit even to his forbearance: the resignation of his sword to two City officers was an indignity he could not brook.

At the name of the ambassador, the officers persisted no longer, but permitted him to pass on, to the great dissatisfaction of the people, who, but for the interference of the guard, would have vented their discontent in something more than words.

Castelnau complained bitterly to the queen, on his next audience—who caused the officials to be rebuked for not having better understood the privileges of an ambassador.

We have introduced this little episode as being highly illustrative of the manners and customs of the times. In the same year in which this extraordinary sumptuary law was passed, Elizabeth issued a proclamation prohibiting the erection of any more houses within three thousand paces of the gates of London. She was alarmed at the rapid increase of the metropolis.

What would her virgin majesty say, could she step out of her tomb at Westminster, and take a bird's-eye view of London now?

CHAPTER LIII.

Britannia rules the waves.

In the midst of her courtships and ridiculous sumptuary laws, the great effects of which were to cripple trade, and render the higher classes dissatisfied, Elizabeth never lost sight of the true policy of an English sovereign, which was and is, to maintain the naval supremacy of the kingdom. She not only encouraged ship-building, by wise and just laws, but maintained her own navy in a state of efficiency; no pleasures, no coquetries appear for an instant to have diverted her from this great purpose.

Amongst those who most distinguished themselves in the naval annals of her reign, was Sir Francis Drake, whose name was so long the terror of Spain. This gallant officer, born of an obscure family, had been apprenticed, when a boy, to a pilot at Upnor, who at his death left him the vessel in which they had been accustomed to navigate the seas together.

This enabled the yet undistinguished adventurer to accomplish a purpose on which he had long meditated—namely, a voyage round the world. The discovery of unknown countries was not the only object of Drake's voyage. He attacked and plundered many of the Spanish colonies, then gorged with the wealth of the New World, and accumulated an immense booty, with which he returned to England, not over satisfied in his own mind, perhaps, as to how he should be received. In order to conciliate the queen and make friends, he distributed a great portion of the wealth he had thus acquired amongst the ministers and the principal nobility: some of whom, however, declined receiving his gifts, affecting to condemn the manner in which he had obtained them. Elizabeth, however, was not so scrupulous: she not only accepted the gold and silver plate which the enterprising navigator offered her, but publicly displayed her favour towards him, by visiting him on board his ship at Deptford, where she was entertained with great magnificence.

As soon as the maiden monarch had set foot on the deck of his little vessel, its commander bent the knee, thanked her majesty for the great honour she had done him, and prayed that she would condescend to accept of a poor collation which he had prepared.

"Willingly, Master Drake!" replied the politic queen, who foresaw, perhaps, even at that period, the time must arrive when the service of the bold buccaneer might be necessary for the security of her throne and life; "and, God willing, before we depart, we will do you yet greater honour."

Descending to the cabin, the royal visitor not only partook of the collation offered, but promised Drake her royal commission to explore the coasts of the New World: in other words, to plunder the infant colonies of Spain.

There was a condition, however, annexed: it was, that she should share in the booty.

Many of the nobility who had declined receiving Drake's presents, began to repent their squeamishness, and would willingly have recalled their ungracious refusals; but the great navigator had no longer need of their influence or intercession. He had found a protectress more powerful than them all, and wisely kept what remained of the treasure he had accumulated to himself.

"What will Spain say to this public honour conferred upon the man who has so notoriously robbed her?" demanded the Earl of Leicester of Lord Burleigh—not that he had been one amongst the squeamish nobles; "it may lead to war!"

"Not yet," replied the astute minister; "although eventually it must come to that. Philip has too much upon his hands in the Low Countries at present, and my royal mistress is right to enfeeble him as much as possible by diminishing his resources from the New World. I did not think so at first," he added, "but reflection has convinced me that she has acted wisely."

The favourite smiled: perhaps he knew, or guessed, what additional reasons the wily minister had received, to induce him to change his opinions.

The yards of the ship were manned, and, amid the booming of the cannon and the cheers of the crew, the queen prepared to quit the vessel, at whose mast the royal standard was still flying.

Drake knelt upon the deck, and once more thanked her majesty for the honour of her visit.

"Thanks to you, Master Drake," replied Elizabeth, "for your cheer and good service! We told you, when we set foot upon your quarter-deck, that we intended you greater honour than our poor presence could confer: we are not unmindful! Leicester," she added, turning towards the Earl, "lend me your sword!"

The favourite drew his weapon from its scabbard, and, kneeling, presented it to his sovereign—who, in the name of God and St. George, the ice struck the adventurous navigator upon the shoulder.

"Arise," she said, "Sir Francis Drake!"

Three hearty cheers were given by the crew, to testify their joy at the honour thus publicly conferred upon their commander: an honour which, in the reign of Elizabeth, was considered no mean recompense even for years of distinguished service—for the maiden monarch was exceedingly chary of such favours. At the present day the dignity of knighthood has been so frequently prostituted by being conferred on sheriffs, mayors, quacks, and speculators, that it has fallen into ridicule: the only class excluded from it by the government of late years, have been the scholar and the poet. But why complain?

The exception is in itself a distinction, when Jews, Hindoos, and railway speculators are found eligible.

An amusing instance of family pride occurred on the occasion of Elizabeth knighting the fortunate navigator, and the queen's whimsical revenge.

The new-made knight assumed, as a coat of arms, a shield with three wiverns—the device of Sir Bernard Drake, a gentleman of very ancient lineage, and most irascible temper.

The first time he met Sir Francis, he demanded, in a haughty tone, how he durst claim kindred with him, and assume the cognisance of a family which repudiated all such alliance.

"I claim no such alliance," answered the rough sailor; "but took the wiverns as belonging to the Drakes generally!"

This reply so incensed the old gentleman, that he gave his namesake a sound box on the ears, observing, that "every goose was not a drake;" and threatened to repeat the chastisement every time he encountered him, till the cause of offence should be removed, by his assuming some other coat of arms than his.

Sir Francis appears to have received the insult with a patience perfectly unaccountable in one of his known bravery—probably on account of the age of his antagonist. But the queen took upon herself to avenge him—which she did by granting him a shield, on which was a ship, in the shrouds of which was a wivern suspended by the legs.

This was intended as an atonement for the indignity he had received at the hands of his namesake; who does not, however, appear to have been much mortified upon the occasion: since he coolly, or perhaps prudently, observed, that her majesty had a perfect right to grant the new-made knight what arms she pleased, so that he did not assume three wiverns, the peculiar badge of his ancient house: and there the matter, to the surprise of the whole court, ended. The probability is, that Elizabeth, who was so proud on the score of family and descent herself, was secretly pleased with the spirited conduct of the old man, and had privately warned him not to carry his resentment any further.

The keen perception of Elizabeth in selecting her ministers and servants, was one of the principal causes of her successful reign.

It is recorded, that on one occasion she happened to be in court, when Sir Thomas Egerton, a distinguished lawyer, pleaded against the crown on a civil action, and obtained a verdict in favour of his client.

"He shall never plead against me again!" she exclaimed, with her usual decision: and she kept her word, by immediately appointing him a queen's counsel.

This was the same Egerton whom she afterwards promoted to the office of Solicitor-General and Lord Keeper, which he filled towards the close of her reign.

That which Elizabeth had once decided upon, she adhered to firmly, as in the instance of Drake. Although the Spanish ambassador made strong and even menacing remonstrances, and demanded restitution of the treasure taken by the pirate, as he termed him, the queen turned a deaf ear—not a single ingot was given up: this circumstance tended still further to increase the ill feeling already existing between the two courts.

A D R I E N N E.

A ROMANCE OF SAVOY.

CHAPTER VIII.

ADRIENNE'S liking for Balmat grew rapidly, and took firm root as it grew. It was not a mere childish fancy for an attractive object, likely to be effaced by the new impression of another more attractive—but a solid regard, founded on one of those fixed principles which arise in early life from very brief occurrences. The soil of a young mind brings promptly to maturity any seed of sentiment which is chance-sown in proper season. It dispenses with all the culture of reason and reflection, which in more advanced years is required to justify an attachment or confirm a passion. It was gratitude that formed the basis of Adrienne's regard; and, in a generous mind capable of doing a service without selfishness, and receiving one without envy, that is the best foundation for affection. Neither was Balmat's one of those fleeting fancies which sports with its object as a plaything, to be changed, on some caprice, for a new toy. He looked upon Adrienne as the instrument of a higher power, intended to turn him into the ways of virtuous thought. In a more elevated mood, he at times considered her as a little missionary from heaven itself, sent on his path of life, to lead to his conversion. While with her he was ever alive to this notion, and he admitted, as if by right, in their daily intercourse, her supremacy on almost every matter of feeling, opinion, or sentiment.

All this was very flattering to a girl hitherto the associate of children, and treated only as a child. Unconscious of any merit that could entitle her to so much consideration on Balmat's part, she regarded it as the effect of sheer good-nature and benevolence; and knowing herself to be the only object on which he had ever exercised those qualities, she was grateful in a far greater degree than she would have been to any other person. With the usual mistake of the inexperienced or thoughtless, she made the great error of estimating Balmat's character according to his conduct towards her. That is the proper standard by which to measure men's affections, but not their opinions. We may very well love—and love very well—the object we do not esteem. We rob the heart of one of its best privileges when we insist on its rejecting the offerings of those who treat us well, merely because they act ill towards others. Love, in all its modifications, is, and ought to be, an individuality. But Adrienne, had she been older or wiser, would have known that few men are everything to all men; and that each individual is entitled to form a distinct and separate estimate of each. As it was, she was as thoroughly satisfied of Balmat's worth as she had reason to be of his regard; and a few days of their intercourse wholly removed every previous impression in his disfavour. His delight at this result was unbounded and deep-felt. He viewed himself day by day as a better man. Adrienne's embrace was worth a dozen homilies. He felt as though baptised into grace without water. He was virtually recanting his errors, without the performance of penance. The shock produced by the incident I have awhile ago recorded was, therefore, violent in the extreme. He seemed to have at once relapsed into all his former ferocity. Had he not imagined that the form of Adrienne interposed between her mother and his uplifted arm, he would have believed himself abandoned both by heaven and her. But the wild workings of his mind all revolved round the conviction that she was his only chance of safety and happiness—the star by whose brightness he had alone to steer; and in that voyage of life which he now contemplated, he was resolved to carry her with him, as at once his pilot and his cynosure.

Adrienne could not rightly comprehend Balmat's manner, or reach the exact meaning of the vague hints dropped by him during this morning's visit. His mind was evidently troubled, and his words were at times unconnected and rambling. It was clear that his thoughts, like evening shadows, embraced some far and dim perspective, on which they threw a still deeper shade. Adrienne was yet too childish and inexperienced to send her mental vision into the space of abstraction in which her companion's wandered, but she had good sense enough to abstain from any attempt to pry into his secret thoughts.

The day was passed as usual by the two friends, sauntering in the glen, reposing in the shade, and at times retiring into the chalet, for purposes of refreshment or for the preparation of each homely repast. They talked pretty much to the same effect, as at other times, on subjects rather circumscribed, but full of local interest; but the particular tone of thoughtfulness which overcame all Balmat's efforts to conquer it, cast a heaviness quite unusual over the day's intercourse. He looked now and then with an air of regret at every object, as if a mental leave-taking was passing in his mind. He felt as if driven out by the necessity of fate from a paradise of his own making, and he was perplexed by doubts and fears as to Adrienne's feelings on the proposal he was so soon to make, and so resolved to enforce. As evening came on, and his mind was more made up, he grew proportionably more composed, and he took his leave for the night in his usual affectionate and disengaged manner. Adrienne had almost forgotten his former air of uneasiness, and she prepared to retire to rest as soon as he left the chalet, locking the door with his accustomed caution, which all his confidence in his beloved prisoner never induced him to neglect.

As Balmat took his downward course towards home, he felt the oppression of the sultry air hang round him like the heavy gloom which seemed as though it stifled his thoughts. Yet the unusual closeness of the atmosphere was not particularly remarked by one so little alive to exterior impressions, and not observant of changes of weather, to which he was at most times indifferent. For the last fortnight a succession of splendid days and nights had given an additional enchantment to the scenery of the Alps. Not a cloud had hovered on their sides, and yet the sunbeams were tempered by those delicious breezes which seem to steal out of the mountain's breast, for no purpose but to sport with the wild flowers, and wait their perfumes about. Adrienne, who had fully enjoyed those exquisite advantages of the season and the climate, had felt, as she lay down on her leafy couch, all the oppression of the thick and heavy contrast to the balmy breath of the preceding nights. She tossed about uneasily for awhile, envying the goat, which occupied a rude shed outside the chalet, and for the first time since she had taken up her present quarters, regretting and being discontented with the restraint which prevented her from rushing out into the open air, and seeking on a bed of grass the refreshing rest which was banished from her own. But youth and the impulses of nature make light of almost all obstacles of atmosphere or climate. Adrienne was soon asleep, nor were her ears disturbed by the distant growl of the thunder, nor her eyes affected by the pale flashes of lightning, which were like faint reflections from the snow-heaps that received the distant illumination.

As soon as Balmat reached his dwelling, he began in earnest to look into his accounts, and turn in his mind the various details of his affairs, necessary for the regulation of the removal which he contemplated for the morrow. Thus employed, he paid little attention to the oppressive heat, and less to the distant voice of the storm, which, as night set in, became more confirmed. It was evident to every one in a mood for observation, that nature was labouring in some great convulsion. Whirlwinds swept along the valley, raising up the dust in spiral columns, till it mingled with the misty shrouds that came down from the mountain's sides. Rolling masses of vapour pressed on those lighter mists, and sudden darkness covered the whole landscape. The trees were shaken to the earth. Even the gnarled stems became flexible, and bent their stubborn bulk before the blast. The waves of the little river were swollen and tossed in foam, far beyond either bank. The colossal battlements which hem in the valley were raked by the sudden storm-gusts, and huge fragments of rock were hurled down below. As the hurricane increased, the time-worn trunks of heavy pine-trees were snapped across, branches were whirled about like feathers in the air, and the ground groaned with the monstrous birth of uprooted roots, scattered to and fro like un-buried skeletons. And then, while the hoarse wind galloped on, and the deep-mouthed caverns echoed its fierce moaning, the portals of heaven appeared thrown wide open. The clouds cast out their hitherto pent-up furies; vivid, streaming fires poured forth, and the rattling volleys of sound which followed every flash were like the shouts of mischief-loving fiends who sported in the elemental war.

Such is the moment when the mind that despises the mean home of human nothingness, flies panting through the thunder-shaken space, soars far above the sordid confines of worldly things, and, with the pride that suits the soul, feels that earth is not wide enough for man.

But he who now rushed out into the storm and braved its fury, was not moved by any such elevated imaginings. It was the more impulse of human passion, the powerful sense of affection, stirring the pulse of animal courage, which urged forth Gabriel Balmat to throw himself between the natural fears of his young prisoner, and the possible dangers to which she might be exposed. Not being a man of lively fancy, he was not tortured by the dread of what might have already happened. But, the whole force of his feelings being excited, he toiled along his path with the desperate confidence of a bold mind that believes itself, in the moment of action, invulnerable and invincible. His only feeling was, "Let me reach her!" Once on the spot, he had no doubts as to his ability to soothe, inspire, and save her. And so he laboured on, blown to the earth more than once by the wind, drenched by the flood of rain, beaten by the hailstones, half blinded by the sulphurous flashes, and almost stunned by the thunder-claps and the roaring of the storm.

When he was about half way up the path to the chalet, a sudden cessation of all those difficulties took place. All was still and calm, as though nature had sunk into a deep sleep. Not a sound was heard but the rushing of the mountain streams, now swelled into so many cataracts, and which here and there, sweeping across Balmat's path, formed new obstacles to retard, but without power to finally prevent, his progress. Never had he made so fatiguing a march, yet never had he felt less susceptible of fatigue. He was braced up to a power of physical endurance that nothing seemed capable of subduing. The calm which had so suddenly succeeded to the late furious agitation, left him time for reflection; and now, for the first time, his thoughts turned for a moment to the possible personal chances which might have befallen Adrienne in her solitude, and to the effect which so fearful a tempest might have produced on her mind. The mental shock of this reflection urged him electrically forward. He soon reached the entrance of the glen; and, pushing on through every impediment of mud and stones, forced onward by the rushing stream, he was making rapid progress, when a sudden flash of lightning, and a close-fol-lowing thunder-clap, told him that the storm had burst out anew, and near at hand. He sprang forward with breathless speed. A quick succession of flashes showed him his way clearly. He gained a view of the little hut. He threw up his hand towards heaven, and uttered a faint shout of joy, when at that instant another cloud, which seemed waiting over the spot, in order that he might witness the catastrophe, opened wide. A stream of fire shot out directly upon the chalet's roof: the crash of the thunder was so quick, that Balmat could not hear the noise of the shattered walls; but he was in no want of light to see that the little building was split open to the earth, and that it lay on it, a heap of ruins.

Who has not felt the heart-sickness of fear for a beloved object—the sense of powerful affliction at being unable to ward off a danger from the one best loved? It was such that now unmanned the fierce Balmat for a moment, even unto complete prostration. Then came the horrid thought that Adrienne must have been destroyed: and that was the spring that gave him instant motion again. His was a mind to rush into a knowledge of the worst. He sprang forward, leaped over the rugged barrier of ruined wall, and beheld Adrienne—pale, breathless, but unharmed—sitting on her little couch, and looking up with fixed gaze at the mountains, which were incessantly illuminated by the broad flashes, and might be supposed shaken to their very base by the terrific peals that rattled through the whole Alpine chain.

As soon as Adrienne saw Balmat, she rushed into his arms. He was completely overpowered by the varied emotions so rapidly excited, and so forcibly felt. He clasped her close, but did not speak a word in reply to her expressions of delight at having him with her, of astonishment at her escape, and of admiration of the awful scene which was still at intervals represented before her.

"Oh, Adrienne!" said Balmat, at length, "I have suffered much on your account; but most of all, from remorse at having exposed you to this! Thank God, you have escaped! You must now leave this wretched place! The storm is going down to the valley: we may safely follow it, Adrienne! Let us hurry away. The rain is still heavy: you must not linger here, nor on the road!"

"And where are we to go, Monsieur Balmat?" asked she, almost tremblingly.

"Where? Wherever your heart prompts to, Adrienne," said he.

"Oh, thank you—thank you a thousand times! To my father's—to my father's, then! Oh, think what my parents may have felt on my account, during this scene! How wicked I have been to have left them so long in suspense about me! You would have taken me home long ago, if I had required it! Oh, I am ashamed of myself! This frightful scene has been a punishment for my unnatural conduct! How good God has been, not to kill me outright! Oh, come—come, Monsieur Balmat! My dear, kind friend and protector, take me home!"

"Yes, Adrienne, I will indeed take you home; and much do I give praise to heaven for having spared you!"

Oh, dearest Adrienne, if you knew what agony I have felt about you, you would love me, I am sure!"

"I do love you, very, very much! I assure you I do!"

"And you will not let your father and mother turn you against me?"

"Oh, they will love you, too—depend upon it they will, when you restore me to them—when I tell them all you have done to make me happy, and the fearful danger you have snatched me from, and come to share—all out of love to me!"

"Well, Adrienne, I trust in you! I care not for any one else; but I hope the memory of this night will make you love me always, and in spite of every one!"

With these words, solemnly spoken, Balmat wrapped Adrienne's cloak about her, produced her bonnet from the rubbish around, and, hastily snatching a few articles of her dress, he took her under his arm, and carefully led her out. Once beyond the ruined walls, she stopped and anxiously looked about. Balmat knew what she sought for, and, leading her aside, he said:

"Oh, it is no matter for to-night! I will come up for her in the morning; never mind her!"

"Ah!" said Adrienne, quickly, and stopping as she spoke; "I understand you—she is dead! She is killed by the lightning!"

"Yes, my little friend, it is indeed true! Your favourite lies dead there! I saw her as we came out!"

A violent flood of tears was Adrienne's answer. Without speaking a word, she hastily drew her arm from under Balmat's, turned towards the shed, and there saw the lifeless body of her goat—the object of her last fortnight's constant attachment—the companion of her solitude—the link which seemed to keep up her connection with her family. She was sincerely and severely grieved. Balmat did not attempt to console her childish and affectionate regret. He would have patiently stood beside her all night, had she remained there weeping over her lost favourite. But she soon turned away again—for, child as she was, she had the higher object of home happiness strongly stirring in her heart.

Very few words were spoken on the way to the valley. They soon arrived at Jean Carrier's house. There were lights within, as if the family had not yet retired to rest; though the storm had gradually spent itself, and a fresh, delicious calm had followed upon its furious traces.

"Open the door!" said Balmat, striking against it with his stick.

"It is that monster, Gabriel!" exclaimed the mother's voice, from within.

Balmat's teeth were involuntarily ground together, and he blushed deeply; but there was no light to betray his agitation.

"Oh, my dearest mamma, it is I! Pray let me in!" said Adrienne.

A scream of joy was the answer; and in a moment the door opened, and both father and mother appeared, and clasped their recovered daughter in their arms. Balmat stood for awhile without moving, looked on, and seemed to enjoy the scene.

"What is all this? Whence came you, Adrienne? Where has she been, Gabriel? Tell me all about it! I can listen to everything, anything, now I have her safe again!" said Carrier.

"She will tell you, neighbour Jean!" replied Balmat, in a voice broken and almost inaudible.

"Oh, God bless you for this, Gabriel! You have saved my life, in restoring my child!" sobbed forth Madame Carrier.

"Come in—come in, Gabriel! You are drenched with the rain, and looking dreadfully tired! Come and have something to comfort you! Come in!" said Jean.

"No, Jean—not to-night! I really cannot!" replied Balmat, resisting his entreaties and his efforts to lead him into the house.

"Well, then, to-morrow you will come to see us, to let us thank you for this blessed relief—to explain all that has occurred—to be friends with us—in short, you will come to-morrow, Gabriel?"

"Oh, yes, you surely will?" added the mother.

"Ay, that he will! I promise for him. He will not refuse my invitation!" exclaimed Adrienne, embracing Balmat with the most affectionate air.

"Adrienne, you have performed a miracle! Yes, my good neighbours, I will come to see you to-morrow!" said Gabriel.

Then, cordially squeezing the hands of both husband and wife, and imprinting a warm kiss on Adrienne's forehead, he walked away; while they, after watching until his dark form began to disappear in the gloom, retired into their now happy home again. Gabriel looked back at them as they stood; but long before the distance between them was enough to conceal them from his sight, they were invisible to him, from the gushing tears that dimmed his eyes; and in stifling his sobs, he was almost choked by the emotion, that he would not for worlds have betrayed.

CHAPTER IX.

THE lapse of time between the close of the first part of this story and the opening of this, is like the chasm of a glacier, appearing almost nothing when the whole is taken in by the mind or the eye, but full of many a rugged point and rude projection, both difficult and dangerous when examined in detail. But this interval of six or seven years must now be bounded over, without our descending to the minuteness of scrutiny into feelings or events. Great changes had taken place, physical in the one instance, and moral in both, in the two chief personages of our story. The whole tenor of their life had received a new direction, and their beings purposely seemed fixed for ever.

Immediately on the reconciliation between Balmat and the Carriers, the former proposed, and they accepted the offer, that he was, from that memorable morning, to take upon himself the whole charge of Adrienne's education; and, without actually adopting her as his child—which the laws admitted, but which was a measure—he scarcely knew why—extremely repugnant to his feelings—he intimated that she alone should be the final possessor of all the property he then had, or might afterwards acquire: an inheritance of small positive value then, but which he hoped, by industry and perseverance, to make an object of more worth. In pursuance of the authority which this gave him over the pursuits of his young protégée, he decided, and her parents consented, that she was immediately to be placed at a boarding-school, at Martigny, her education to be conducted at his expense and under his control. There she was consequently placed, and there she remained, acquiring a store of such knowledge and accomplishments as were suited to her station in life; visited frequently by her father and mother, constantly by Balmat, and gradually growing up into a fine, well-informed and intelligent young woman.

Adrienne Carrier was in her eighteenth year, when, her education having been pronounced complete, she left the school where she had passed so long a time profitably and pleasantly, where she had made many friends by her good sense and good nature, and for which she felt all the mixed attachment inspired by the scene of childish joys, modified, as such enjoyments always are, by the feeling of restraint and the check of control which deprive them of that perfect buoyancy which is the fairy spell of happiness.

During this period of probation for her entrance into the busy scenes of the world, a considerable change had taken place, as has been already stated, and as might be divined, even without the statement, both in Adrienne's personal appearance and her way of mind. She looked, and felt, and thought as a woman; and it will not be considered unnatural that almost every feeling and sentiment had for its chief impulse him who had by degrees become to her the dearest object in life. The early but indelible impression of her mountain adventure had stamped her character with a deep enthusiasm, but not of that kind which sometimes runs wild in vague abstraction. Adrienne required and found an object on which it might become concentrated. The pride of having, as a mere child, effected a total revolution in such a mind as Balmat's, soon became blended with her regard for him from which it had its source; and, as she grew towards womanhood, she could not avoid seeing that her influence over him had increased in that degree by which the convert to an opinion becomes the martyr of a cause. He was wholly devoted to her, and health, wealth, and every human good was identified in his thoughts with the absolute possession of Adrienne Carrier. His conduct for upwards of six years was correspondent with this thorough attachment to a virtuous and sensible girl. He was a reformed man. He became attentive to his business, civil to, if not quite sociable with, his neighbours, indulgent to his old woman, and in all his ways unexceptionable in his bearing towards the members of the Carrier family, young and old.

I cannot undertake to trace the growth of the master passion which gradually advanced towards full development in the heart of this mysterious man. The progress from conception to maturity, from the seed to the full-blown flower, is an unathomable miracle, at which the inquiring mind stops short. So does the moral budding and blossoming of human feeling baffle research and defy analysis. Suffice it to say, that Balmat's affection for the artless child had grown into passionate love for the blooming girl; and as soon as he thoroughly understood his own sentiments, he could not help their forcing themselves into the observation of those most concerned. Adrienne had by some sure instinct discovered his feelings, even before he acknowledged them: and the father and mother only saw in the open avowal, the realisation of long-indulged hopes and expectations. In a word, Gabriel Balmat was the accepted lover of Adrienne Carrier; and some little arrangements of property and domestic accommodations were alone required to allow of the day for the marriage being fixed, and the engagement being made public.

Everything went smoothly with Balmat. He had no rival. The very superiority of Adrienne to the other village girls, while naturally attracting admiration, at the same time inspired a sentiment of respect which considerably damps the ardour of rustic pretensions. She was wholly free from the contemptible vanity that leads some women on to the encouragement of many admirers, in the hope of more closely attaching one favoured lover. Adrienne ran no risk of that most dangerous of female speculations; and Balmat's dormant, but well-remembered ferocity, was another considerable safeguard against any interference with his passion on the part of younger but less determined aspirants. He was, therefore, as yet unconscious of the existence in his soul of the meanest and most degrading of all the passions; but jealousy was there, deep-hidden and rankling, and only waiting for some real or imagined provocation to burst out in volcanic violence. Unhappily for himself, and for her whose well-being was now bound up in his, an opportunity soon occurred for the outburst, which swept before it the whole harvest of years of moral cultivation.

The French invasion of Switzerland and Savoy took place. It is not within the scope of this story to admit of political details; and the very mention of this great national event must be considered but as an episode to the narrow subject of personal adventure, the chief incident of which actually grew out of the transaction of history which is thus alluded to in subterfuge to it. French enterprise and Swiss patriotism are hackneyed themes, and the gallant actions which arose from the collision are so widely known and so well recorded, as to leave no want of, and scarcely room for, their recital here. The great and abounding tragedies of war must be left untouched, to let us concentrate our attention on one deep drama of domestic life.

Gabriel Balmat's intellect was not broad enough to allow of his comprehending the grand motives of nationality. He was scarcely susceptible of the local attachment which is commonly and mistakenly called love of country, but which is, in ordinary minds, rather a love of self, and an instinctive pride in whatever they feel themselves to form a part of. It has been already seen that enmity was the natural growth of his disposition, which was almost insensible—except in one mighty instance—to affection. He therefore felt none of the stirring impulses which inspired many among the warriors who sprang forward to repel the invader. But he fought with bravery, and his hatred of the enemy made him strike home with as much energy as though a loftier inspiration had nerved his arm. Scenes of blood became familiar to him, and his main propensity was thus gratified and strengthened; while, from the general hatred against Frenchmen at large so naturally fostered among his compatriots, his vindictive feelings acquired a more extended sphere of action. Every native of the country which outraged and oppressed his own, was, in his eyes, an object of particular vengeance; and this generalised feeling became in some measure, to his distorted intellect, a justification for the individual enmity which he after awhile adopted.

When the sturdy mountaineers were driven before the French armies, the different portions of the country successively occupied were covered with depots of the sick and wounded, and, in many instances, several of those were placed in single billets, in the houses of the farmers and peasants of the valleys on the line of march. Chamouni had its share, and Jean Carrier and his family gave a cordial and comfortable shelter to one—a young man—who, with the rank of sergeant, possessed manners of a superior order to that station, and whose fine person and handsome countenance appeared to greater advantage, from the delicacy and languor consequent on pain and confinement. A rifle-shot through his shoulder, received a few weeks previously, quite disabled him of the use of his right arm; and frequent attacks of fever, which succeeded to the immediate severity of the hurt, left him in a state that could hardly be called convalescent.

Kind-hearted people, like the Carriers, required no inducement beyond the least complicated compassion, to insure their attention to the wounded stranger.

But refinement, education, and taste would be little better than worthless, had they not produced in the feelings of Adrienne a still tenderer interest for this new object of her admiration, as well as her pity. The vulgar benevolence which knows no distinction of persons in a crowd of wretchedness, is, after all, a less elevated feeling than that which instinctively selects its objects for peculiar regard. Adrienne Carrier would have succoured and served the meanest of God's creatures, from a feeling of duty; but there are few minds which could derive from that sentiment alone such a spring of alacrity as that with which she performed her offices of kindness towards Henri Lavalette.

This young Frenchman was, like thousands of his countrymen in those exciting days, an enthusiastic patriot—loving France, liberty, and glory; and, in that powerful passion for public things, having no room for any affection of a private nature, beyond the attachment so interwoven in the hearts of Frenchmen for their family connections. It was therefore, and not from any insensibility to softer emotions, or from an incapacity to appreciate Adrienne's merits, that the thought of making love to her never entered his heart—for, in spite of all theories of physiology, it is by that road that such notions reach the head. He was delighted to find a well-informed and intelligent girl in the house of a Chamouni miller; and perhaps her being very good-looking, rather added a zest to her great good nature.

Adrienne, unaccustomed to manners so accomplished and captivating, was naturally pleased with the society of her new acquaintance, and a rapid familiarity was the consequence between them. The absence on either side of any serious impression, gave fuller play to their mutual efforts to please. They knew none of the embarrassment which is always an obstacle to a perfect understanding between persons who are unconsciously about to fall in love with each other. They spoke freely together, and there was no reserve in the communicating of their opinions of others or of each other. How long it is before a man really in love can tell the object how highly he values—how much he loves it! A woman can never do so.

The young friends now in question, not having that formidable difficulty before them, the warmth of their mutual regard was proportioned to its rapid growth. Jean and Christine Carrier, becoming every year more matter-of-fact, and not a bit more worldly wise, never imagined any danger from their daughter's intercourse with the young soldier—believing her to be firmly protected by the solemnity of her engagement to Balmat, from any possible intrusion on the part of another. Their ignorant confidence was justly placed in the present instance. But it must be clearly understood that it was so by chance, and it must not furnish either example or excuse for dull and unobserving fathers and mothers in the general walks of life. Altogether, there was not anywhere to be found a more unembarrassed and confiding circle than that contained in the house of Jean Carrier; and the return of Gabriel from a roving expedition beyond the great St. Bernard was now anxiously looked for by the whole party, as the completion of a plan of social enjoyment rarely to be found in such troublous times and in all the circumstances of the case.

The wished-for day arrived. It was autumn time, and the assembled family were abroad in scattered groups by the river-side, and in the narrow pasture-ground which intervened between it and the mountain's base. The elderly couple were quietly walking arm-in-arm, the youths and the younger sister jumping and running about, while Adrienne and Lavalette lounged along the river's side, familiarly talking over her approaching prospects in married life.

A keen eye and quick perception may read in the gait and attitudes of a beloved object, even when the voice cannot be heard, or the countenance seen, the general state of the mind—though not, perhaps, the immediate subject of thought. How easy it is to discover the hurried step of agitation from the slower movement of despair or the broken and buoyant march of joy. How eloquent is each action of the human frame! The arms folded or tossed about—the head elevated or down hanging—the foot firm, fixed, or faltering. Nature is, in fact, in all its multiplied developments, a combination of languages; and this is one which the glance of affection reads with intuitive accuracy, as though it were written in a book. Such a glance was now steadily fixed on Adrienne Carrier—but it was affection of that kind which, while it reads rightly, is sure to interpret wrong.

When Gabriel Balmat now returned to his native village, after one of those roving expeditions on which he was a volunteer, animated with success and flushed with the indulgence of his sanguinary propensity, he did not choose, like his comrades, to come in the beaten road, in that species of irregular, but triumphant march which amused them by its picturesqueness and éclat. His unsocial spirit led him to prefer a solitary walk by a mountain path, and he wished to steal unobserved and unexpected into the midst of the family circle of his friends, to judge for himself of the effect which his sudden appearance might produce. Besides this, there was a latent feeling of suspicion always lurking in his mind, arising from the want of confidence in the sincerity of others which is the sure accompaniment of self-distrust, and which forms the most congenial soil for the growth of jealousy—and such a feeling strongly seconded this clandestine approach. Totally unperceived by the groups below, he reached a little plateau on the mountain side, and gazed downward with a stern and inquiring eye. He quickly singled out the figure of his betrothed; and he marked beside her, with a frantic pang of astonishment and fury, the figure of a man, in the well-known and detested uniform of the French armies. Willy as he was bold, he in an instant dropped on one knee, and watched. He clearly saw, in the easy gait and graceful gestures of Adrienne, that she was happy and pleased with the words of her companion, who assiduously, while he addressed her, suited his action to the speeches he poured forth. At one moment his hand was on his heart—in the next, it was stretched forth, while his head turned towards her, as though he would impress some observation, or some pledge—as Balmat read it—upon her. At the distance of a hundred yards, which separated them, he could not distinguish the expression of Adrienne's face. But nothing further was wanting to inflame him. And when he at length saw the stranger—enemy take one of his mistress's hands in his and press it to his lips, he was hurried away beyond all restraint. His rifle was in a moment levelled, and the trigger was instantly pulled.

"Holloa!" exclaimed Henri Lavalette, as he heard the well-remembered sound of the bullet, cutting the air close to his head.

"Ah, there is Gabriel!" cried Adrienne, starting at the report, and turning her eyes towards the place, where he had now risen on his feet again, anxiously watching the result of his shot. And, as she spoke, she ran forward, followed by her brothers and sisters, shouting welcome to him who had (though they knew it not), sent so ruthless a herald in proof of his close neighbourhood.

"Ah, that is the way Gabriel Balmat always announces his approach ever since he took up arms!" said Jean Carrier to Lavalette, as the latter joined him and his helpmate, both hurrying in the direction of their now descending visitor.

"He must be a keen marksman, to miss so closely the object he only wishes to pay a compliment to!" observed the Frenchman.

"Oh, he is one of the best shots in the valley!" said Jean.

"In that case I had a narrow escape!" thought the Frenchman—but he said nothing, being impressed with a painful suspicion that the bullet was certainly intended for his head, instead of the trunk of the pine-tree which stood before him, and in which it had lodged.

Gabriel instantly saw that he had missed his mark. His first impulse was to rush down and complete his ruthless purpose with the unloaded weapon; but the shouts of his young friends, and, above all, the animated figure of Adrienne, as she moved forward to welcome him, excited an immediate and almost miraculous impulse of self-control. In an instant his pulse was steady, his brow smooth, his air unembarrassed; but his pale cheek and livid lip showed that the blood had not yet returned from his heart with the rapidity which a few moments before had hurried it into that great reservoir. He left his place and stepped quickly down, with an easy and guileless manner, to meet his delighted Adrienne. At the first sight of her blooming countenance, he was quite overpowered. He had never known her to deceive him, and he at once acknowledged the full force of her long-experienced virtue and affection. The momentary doubts of her faith which had flashed across his mind on witnessing the incident of familiar gallantry which had raised his arm to murder the offender, vanished at the first glance he threw on her. But his deadly hatred of the stranger was not for an instant shaken in the renewed confidence inspired by his mistress's manner; and, in the system of deep dissimulation which he presently adopted, there was no abandonment of the design that a sudden impulse had prompted him to attempt.

REMARKABLE INDIAN SANG-FROID.

THE inhabitants of the banks of the Orinoco and its tributary streams discourse continually on the dangers to which they are exposed. They have marked the manners of the crocodile, as the torero has studied the manners of the bull. When they are assailed they put in practice, with that presence of mind and that resignation which characterise the Indians, the Zambos, and copper-coloured men in general, the counsels they have heard from their infancy. In countries where nature is so powerful and so terrible, man is constantly prepared for danger. We have mentioned before the answer of the young Indian girl, who delivered herself from the jaws of the crocodile: "I knew he would let me go, if I thrust my fingers into his eyes." This girl belonged to the indigent class of the people, in whom the habits of physical want augment energy of character; but how can we avoid being surprised to observe, in the countries convulsed by terrible earthquakes, on the table-land of the province of Quito, women belonging to the highest classes of society display, in the moment of peril, the same calm, the same reflecting intrepidity? I shall mention one example only, in support of this assertion. On the 4th of February, 1797, when 35,000 Indians perished in the space of a few minutes, a young mother saved herself and children, crying out to them to extend their arms at the moment when the cracked ground was ready to swallow them up. When this courageous woman heard the astonishment that was expressed at a presence of mind so extraordinary, she answered, with great simplicity: "I had been told in my infancy, if the earthquake surprise you in a house, place yourself under a doorway that communicates from one apartment to another; if you be in the open air, and feel the ground opening beneath you, extend both your arms, and try to support yourself on the edge of the crevice."

Thus, in savage regions, or in countries exposed to frequent convulsions, man is prepared to struggle with the beasts of the forest, to deliver himself from the jaws of the crocodile, and to escape from the conflict of the elements.—Humboldt's Travels.

THE FIRE-WORSHIPPERS.—Bayard Taylor writes thus, from Bombay, India, Jan. 1, in regard to certain of the peculiar habits of the Parsees, or fire-worshippers of India: "They are, as is well known, followers of Zoroaster, recognising one good and one evil principle, who contend for the mastery of the universe. They worship the sun, as the representative of God, fire in all its forms, and the sea. Their temples contain no images, but only the sacred fire; and though they have fixed days for the performance of various rites, they repeat their prayers every morning, soon after sunrise. The dead are neither buried nor burned; but exposed to the air, within a wall inclosure, on the summit of a hill. The bodies of the rich are protected by a wire screen till wasted away; but those of the poor are soon devoured by birds of prey. The children are generally married at from two to five years of age, and brought up together till of a proper age to assume the duties of married life. Most of the marriages are celebrated at this time of the year, and the streets continually resound with the music of the bridal processions."

UNSEALED CORRESPONDENCE.—Amongst other expedients adopted to avoid the present high rates of ocean postage, is the practice of sending letters across the sea by private hands, unsealed. A person may convey a portmanteau full of letters in this way, without charge upon them for the transit service. It is impossible to estimate the extent of this unsealed and unpaid correspondence, especially between the myriads of emigrants in the British colonies and other countries and their friends in the mother country. A gentleman, recently returned from a long residence at Port Natal, Africa, thus describes the extent to which this practice is carried by the inhabitants of that colony: "To show their disposition to correspond, I will mention the fact, that whenever a ship was about to sail with passengers home—for as such the emigrant still looks upon old England—they were pressed to take charge of numerous letters, and post them on their arrival. It was so on my leaving the colony; and if the anxiety shown by the emigrants to get their letters ready for me could have been witnessed by the inhabitants of this their fatherland, it would have aroused sufficient feeling and determination to abolish this unwise tax upon their correspondence. To avoid it, and still communicate with those they held dear, I had placed under my care numbers of letters unsealed, and written on sheets of paper without being folded, and the money given me to purchase the penny stamps and post them to their various destinations. Now, who could, or would, refuse to do this? No one who knew what the heart of an emigrant feels. Accustomed to respect and obey the laws, I yet felt it an act of duty and kindness to become thus an agent in avoiding them. Only reflect for a moment! The secrets of family correspondence to be thus exposed, rather than lose an opportunity of sending a line home! Now, had there been an Ocean Penny Postage, I should not have been solicited to bring a single letter: it would have been thought an imposition."

CHINA AND THE CHINESE.

The Chinese and the Russians seem now to be the people who are mostly engaging the attention of the rest of the world; but each in quite a different way. While the latter are developing their views of conquest, the former are in the midst of the troubles, dangers, and sacrifices of a struggle for emancipation from one of the worst tyrannies ever established in any age or among any people. The Chinese of the southern provinces are in a state of revolt against their alien and frightfully despotic Tartar dynasty. And what renders the contest more remarkable is, that the revolutionary party appear to be Christians of the most ultra-Protestant description.

But before we make any comments on this startlingly new chapter in the history of the most mysterious empire ever founded, we must be introduced to a few facts about China and the Chinese. The territory which, until the occurrence of the recent startling events, was ruled over by the Manchoo Tartars, was divided into Northern and Southern China, or Tartarian China and China Proper. The former extended beyond the Great Wall to the Russian frontier; and in a south-westerly direction comprised the vast regions of Thibet, and was almost conterminous with the British possessions to the north of Bengal. Its south-eastern provinces brought it into direct contact with the Burman empire. This enormous extent of land formed, and will still form, the natural boundary between China Proper and Russia. On the boundary line of the two empires stands a small town, called Kiakta, which is distant from Moscow 4200 miles, and from the Great Wall of China 1500 miles: so that, if Russia wished to invade China by land, the best of her troops—the Europeans—would have to march 5700 miles before they could reach the northern limits of that China where anything like the optima spolia of war could be obtained. Why England would almost have time to build and equip a steam fleet, and send an army of a hundred thousand of the best troops in the world to Pekin, and have it encamped on either side of the Great Wall, in six months less time than it would take the Russians to march the same number of men through Siberia, and over the wide expanse of Tartary. The conquest of Persia would open up a nearer route; but as that has yet to be effected, we are sure that, for the present, Russian intrigues in China are nothing more than idle gusts of wind. In the present day, China, to be subdued by a foreign power, must be subdued by one having paramount dominion over the Eastern seas. Russia has not a particle of that authority; England and the United States of America have it all. Therefore, it is idle to talk about Russian aggression in China. Should the revolution now raging succeed in expelling the Tartars from China Proper, no doubt Tartarian China would be severed from the empire; but, as it is the poorer moiety, the loss would not be regretted. It would be only like lopping a huge carbuncle from the main body.

China Proper is comprised between about twenty degrees of longitude, and about twenty-one degrees of latitude—forming an area of 537,000 square miles. The population has been estimated at two hundred millions; but no doubt this is an exaggeration, and that Humboldt gave a more rational estimate, when he gave as the total population of China Proper, one hundred and fifty millions.*

* A portion of the press of this country—especially the diurnal—has fallen into the ridiculous error of estimating the population of China at three hundred millions! We recommend to the attention of such arduous leader-writers the works of Malte Brun, Humboldt, Morrison, Milne, Thom, and Murray's "Discoveries in Asia." It is pitiable to see such a well-known exaggeration put again into circulation.

Chinese Tartary is very thinly populated, and no reasonable approximation to the number of its inhabitants can be formed: so that, for the purposes of this article, we will assume that the population of China Proper, spread over the twenty-one degrees of latitude extending from the Great Wall on the north to the Gulf of Tonquin on the south, is, according to the illustrious German traveller and philosopher, no more than one hundred and fifty millions. And having done so, we will ask whether that is not an astounding number? Why it approaches closely to the population of all Europe; and, as regards its history, traditions, mythology, and character, has, until within the past century, been a mystery in all ages, and among all nations of the world. Even now, our information about this interesting country is only meagre and casual. But now that its seals of darkness are about to be broken, we may hope that sources of knowledge, not only respecting its present, but past, will be speedily opened up to the inquiring intellect of civilised communities.

Histories of China, now pronounced to be apocryphal, if not altogether fabulous, have assigned to the empire of China Proper an antiquity anterior to the commencement of the Jewish chronology. But this point we think Malte Brun has satisfactorily settled.

"In the last century," he observes, "China found her interested and ardent panegyrists in two powerful parties. The French philosophers and the Jesuits vied with each other in extolling the laws and the happiness of that country. The philosophers knew nothing of the subject on which they pronounced a judgment; the Jesuits knew a great deal. But those who reason with impartiality will never prefer the natural religion of Confucius to Christianity; nor will the free and high-minded nations of Europe admit the arrangements of a tyrannical police, the annoyance of a childish etiquette, and the 'great walls' which have been erected for interrupting the communications of the human mind.

"Among these opinions, dictated by enthusiasm and party spirit, we must particularise those which relate to the pretended antiquity of the Chinese empire. We know that the enemies of the Christian religion have made it an important object of research to discover a people whose records are more ancient than Noah's flood, and more ancient than even the common term assigned as the epoch of the Mosaic creation. The pretended antiquity of the Egyptians and the Babylonians having been reduced to its proper value, they recurred to that of India and of China. The wonders of distant countries were fitted to inspire a greater degree of veneration. China was represented as a highly civilised and flourishing empire 4500 years before Christ; and if due time is allowed for the formation of such an empire, it must have existed for a period of ten or twenty thousand years.

"Some ill-informed missionaries, wishing, from motives of vanity, to display the antiquity of an empire of which they pretended to have made a spiritual conquest, went blindly into the same system, without being aware of the consequences to which it led.

"A bad historical compilation, translated from the Chinese,* tells us, that Fohi founded the empire of China about 3000 years before Christ, and that, three centuries after this, Hoang-Ti reigned over flourishing states, which were 1660 miles long, and 1100 broad.

"Unfortunately for such narratives, China has produced historians candid enough to reject all the fables concerning Fohi and Hoang-Ti. They do not even venture to vouch for the traditions respecting the reign of Iao—probably an allegorical person—whose era is fixed twenty-three centuries before Christ. Let us consider in what the great actions of Iao consisted. He drained marshes; he hunted down wild beasts; he cultivated a desert country; and so narrow were the dimensions of his territory, that he surveyed the whole, four times in the year. Ten centuries after this (B. C. 1401), we find the princes of China moving from province to province, accompanied by all their subjects—nomadic, like themselves, and living all alike, either in caves of the rocks, or in cabins of the earth.

"In the time of Confucius (B. C. 551), the whole of China south of the Blue River was still a desert. Nothing in the Chinese annals of that period affords any evidence of a great nation. There is no authentic monument to attest the power of those who erected it. Their books, written on very brittle paper, and very frequently re-copied, can give no information worthy of our confidence. And we further know that, two centuries before the Christian era, a barbarous monarch caused all the writings then in existence to be destroyed. We must, then, with the learned among the Chinese, give the history of China no further extension than eight or nine centuries, at most, before Christ. The hypothesis which finds it entitled to any higher antiquity, owes its origin to the caprice of some modern literati, and the vanity of the emperors.

"But we may be told that astronomical observations, allowed by M. de la Place to be exact, are as ancient as 1100 years before Christ. Laying aside the objections to which the authenticity of these observations is liable, admitting that they are not composed by modern Chinese, they only prove that, 1100 years before Christ, a civilised tribe and town existed, which produced men of science. Eastern Asia may, like Europe, have had her Greeks and her Athenians: there is a great difference between that and the formation of an immense empire. From 1100 to 2300, there is also a long space of time. A shorter interval witnessed the rise, the civilisation, and the extinction of Greece and Rome.

But whatever was the origin of the Chinese, or the period of the commencement of their nationality, China was very well known to the ancient nations of the west. Ptolemy says that caravans penetrated from Bactriana, into the heart of China. The Roman poets make especial reference to the Chinese as the Seres, the inhabitants of Serica, the country of the silk-worm. Virgil expressly mentions the soft wool which the Seres combed from their trees. In the third century of our era, the Chinese court received a Roman embassy. And we are informed that in those ages the Chinese kept a garrison at Kashgar, and one of their generals, about the time of Trajan, marched as far as the Caspian Sea. In the reign of Justinian the eggs of the Chinese worm were introduced into Europe, and the Romans taught to emulate the natives of that remote country in the education of the insect and the manufacture of silk. So that there can be no doubt that the early Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Romans were acquainted with the existence of China; but the commercial intercourse between the east and the west, except as regards India, must have been very limited: hence, when the Roman empire fell to pieces, China and the Chinese had faded into a very dim tradition, which, when revived by the works of the famous Marco Polo and Sir John De Mandeville, in the early part of the thirteenth century, was treated as a romance, until it seized upon the vivid imagination of Columbus, who nursed it through a weary pilgrimage, from court to court, until Isabella pawned her jewels, and enabled him to go and discover America, and, through that circumstance, caused to be opened new worlds to the enterprise of Europe. China was one of these worlds; and at this distance of time it is curious to note that, as regards the works of the Venetian, Marco Polo, and the Englishman, Sir John De Mandeville, we are authorised by facts to remark, that mankind were formerly, and probably are still, as incredulous with respect to statements they could not reconcile with their limited stock of information, as they were credulous to receive anything that savoured of the unreal, or which found access to the imagination through the muddy channel of superstition.

China, throughout the whole of the fifteenth century, was denounced as a delusion; and it was not until the Portuguese navigators who succeeded Vasco De Gama, had crossed the Indian seas, that Europe first received any information on which it thought proper to rely, of the situation, extent, and resources of China; and some generations passed away before it was admitted to be the same country as the Cathay of Marco Polo and Sir John De Mandeville.

Since then the commercial relations established with the Chinese by the Portuguese, the Dutch, the English, and the Americans, have afforded us some more concise knowledge of their history and institutions; but the information that has been accumulated is still very meagre and unsatisfactory. All we know is, that the Chinese are a branch of the Great Mongol family, and that they are progenitally allied to the Mongol conquerors of Hindostan, to the Asiatic Russians, and the Turks, whose position in Europe is now so critical. Their religion appears anciently to have been a species of Sabianism, but it has been smothered under the numerous 'sects' which have been grafted upon it. Buddhism, under the name of the religion of Foh, was introduced from India about A.D. 65, and has become the creed of the majority of the Chinese. The religion of the Mantchoo dynasty is that of the Tartar Lama. The government is a complete Oriental despotism, and China has been governed, until the present outbreak, much in the same manner as the provinces of Turkey are—by pachas or mandarins—a title equivalent to that of count in the middle ages of our own history.

Such a people could scarcely have failed to have excited the most ardent curiosity among nations distinguished for research and enterprise. The English have taken the lead in these explorations, and our warlike exploits on the coast of China contributed more to the unravelling of the Chinese mystery than anything which had previously occurred in the annals of commerce or missionary zeal. But, independent of some acquaintance with Chinese manners, customs, and morals, all the political knowledge we have obtained may be comprised in the statement that we discovered a population of one hundred and fifty millions ruled over by an intruding dynasty of scarcely two centuries' existence; and that there was a marked distinction between the rulers and the ruled, although both owed their origin to a common source. Since then we have been introduced to the circumstance that the ruled have rebelled against the rulers—that China Proper has, like another Behemoth, upheaved its vastness, and made a brilliant effort to drive the Mantchoo Tartars back to the fertile plains and frozen deserts which lie between the Great Wall and the remote southern boundary of Asiatic Russia. This contest has been raging for two years, and, from the latest accounts received, the patriots have subdued, or rather restored, the native Chinese authority in more than one half of Southern China—that is, China Proper. They have already obtained possession of Nankin, and what renders this struggle the more remarkable is, that its leaders profess to maintain the doctrine of Christianity, and that in a most ultra-Protestant form. They unmistakeably profess to be worshippers of Jesus Christ.

They circulate tracts, not copied from missionary tracts, but drawn from the Scriptures by themselves, and written in a far superior style of Chinese to that current, or perhaps possible, to foreigners.

They are iconoclasts, and destroy every vestige of idol worship.

They adopt the Ten Commandments, translated by themselves, to which they have appended annotations: thus they state, under the seventh commandment, that smoking opium is always associated with the sin mentioned there, and must be discontinued.

They behead for smoking opium, and bamboo for smoking tobacco.

They have the Bible complete, and, adopting the Jewish theory, believe they have a mission from heaven to kill all the Mantchoos—and they certainly put this in execution as far as they can; and, without attempting to justify this practice, we believe that nothing short of driving them out of the country can make civilisation progressive in China.

They state that their king was taken up into heaven, and there invested with power to reign; but this is mixed up with that which must be figurative, and therefore may mean no more than is said of all Chinese emperors—that they are empowered by heaven to rule.

They say that their king has received revelations from time to time from God; but it is to be observed that these are all respecting temporal things, and do not refer to the rule of life: that they refer to things of temporary import.

Their leader, who is carrying everything before him with a magnificent hand, is called Huen-su Chuen, or the Tae-Ping-Wang, which, being interpreted, means the "Prince of Universal Peace." His designs have at least the sympathy of all the Christian world; and should he and his followers succeed, there cannot be a doubt but that China—hitherto the great sealed book among nations—will be opened to light, life, and civilisation, all of which will be thrown, with all their importance and influences, into the Anglo-Saxon scale.

We shall, as a matter of duty, watch the progress of this momentous struggle for the enjoyment of a purer spiritual and political dispensation; but must observe, that we are not at all surprised at the revolution having taken place. Christianity, or at least its iconoclastic expositions, are no strangers to the soil of China. Authenticated history informs us that:

The first attempts to make known the truths of Christianity in China, were by the Nestorians—who, from the fifth century, when the sect arose, to the end of the seventh century, penetrated through the various countries eastward of Constantinople, to Tartary, where they spread their doctrines, and instituted Christian societies. In the end of the seventh century they came into China, where, also, they established churches. Little more notice is taken of their proceedings for nearly five hundred years. In the thirteenth century, they are said to have had a flourishing church in the north of China, where it still continued to exist in the beginning of the fifteenth century, after it was nearly extinguished in Tartary. In the fifteenth century and the commencement of the sixteenth, Nestorianism is thought to have entirely died away in China; but this was an erroneous supposition, as proved by subsequent disclosures of facts. There is in the 'Shin-seen-tung-keen'—a Chinese mythological history—a brief account of the birth, life, death, resurrection, ascension, and disciples of Christ. These circumstances are the more remarkable, inasmuch as the Chinese notice every other foreign sect which has entered their country. The Buddhists, the Mahomedans, and the Christians are all particularly noticed by them.

In the thirteenth century, the Roman Catholic Church first extended its efforts, rather indirectly, to China. An embassy, composed chiefly of ecclesiastics, at whose head was Johannes a Monte Corvino, was sent from Pope Nicholas IV. to Kublai, Emperor of the Tartars. Their object seems principally to have regarded Tartary; yet they are said to have erected churches in China, also. In the year 1307, the gospel is reported to have made so great progress in China, that Pope Clement V. erected Cambalu—which some think to be Pekin—into an archbishopric, which was conferred on Johannes a Monte Corvino, above-mentioned.

Francis Xavier, the celebrated Jesuit, had contemplated the conversion of China to the Christian faith; but, in the midst of his benevolent plans, he was called away by death, while off the coast of that country, in the year 1552. Matthew Ricci, an Italian, of the same order, after the death of Xavier, penetrated into China, preached the Catholic faith, and laid the foundation of the Romish Church there. Much stress cannot be laid on anything done for the Gospel in China before the days of Ricci. In the commencement of the seventeenth century, numbers of Jesuits, Dominicans, Franciscans, and Capuchins entered China, and published part of the Gospel, mixed with the superstitions of the Romish Church and the peculiarities of their respective orders.

During the reign of the Emperor Kang-he, the missionaries had less to contend with, and enjoyed more freedom in their work, than either before or since. Several hundreds of Catholic missionaries, including natives and foreigners, have at different times laboured in China; and it is but justice to say, that many of them appear to have been sincere and single-hearted in their work. With respect to the doctrines and ceremonies which they taught in China, a fair specimen of the best of these is contained in the Chinese writings of the missionaries. The style of their publications is generally perspicuous, sometimes elegant; but the doctrines which they communicate are mostly such as were propagated in Europe, in what Protestants call 'the darkest periods of the Church.' Here and there a beautiful sentiment occurs, well expressed, and supported by appropriate quotations from the Fathers of the Latin Church, but often in close connection with some traditional absurdity. Their ritual has certainly lost nothing by being transported to the East. The fictions of Chinese paganism, and the legends of the priests of Foh and Taou, together with imported relations of miracles and wonders, wrought at the shrines of saints, at the tombs of martyrs, or in the caves of hermits, have all contributed to produce considerable additions to the ceremonies of the church.

So that it is quite manifest that Christianity early penetrated into China, and was never wholly extirpated, although all the barbarous bigotry of despotism was brought to bear upon it. We may accept it as fact, that it slumbered in remote places, and among certain classes of the population, for centuries. Buddhism rather predisposes its followers to the doctrines of Christianity. The real Buddha was a pious, religious reformer, who taught that there was a Supreme Being, omniscient and ever present in the world; that human sacrifices were obnoxious to the Deity, and persuaded the people among whom he preached to substitute for them the innocent oblations of flowers. This simple creed in course of time became perverted and disfigured, but the original principle remained; and when we come to consider that the Chinese, from the earliest period, were familiar with the precepts of the Christian religion, there is nothing very wonderful in their hastening into the bosom of a church whose doors are always open to the afflicted and oppressed, or rallying under the banner of a leader who, with a new and more promising faith in one hand, and a sword in the other, leads them not only to liberty, but to the gratification of a long-cherished revenge against their tyrannical Tartar governors.

They have already obtained possession of Nankin, the second city in the empire, of which we give an illustration; and it is probable that long ere this they will have commenced driving the Tartars to that Great Wall originally built to restrain their incursions.

Nankin, except in size, differs little from other Chinese cities. Its ornamental architecture is remarkable for its airiness and singularity. Some of the pagodas are from eighty to one hundred and sixty feet in height, and have as many as nine storeys, but always an uneven number. They seem to be intended merely for ornament; and though occasionally attached to temples, are never, it is said, used as places of worship. The Great Tower of Nankin is the finest specimen of this class of building. The numerous triumphal archways have all the same form, and seldom exceed twenty-five feet in height.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF IRON.—Mr. Thomas Symes Prideaux has patented some improvements in the manufacture of iron. The system employed is to distil coal in retorts, as in the manufacture of gas, and afterwards conveying the product to reverberatory furnaces employed in the manufacture of iron, and burning the same with atmospheric air. The inventor has also an improvement in preparing coke used in the manufacture of iron: he employs lime-water mixed with common salt, or carbonate of soda, instead of simple water, in the process of cooling the heated coke.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.—The Sixteenth Annual Report of Births, Marriages, and Deaths, for 1851, in England and Wales, was printed by order of the House of Commons, and of which the following is a digest: Births, 615,865; illegitimates, 42,000; marriages, 154,206 deaths, 397,174.

ELECTRIC GAS AS A MOTIVE POWER.—The application of electric gas as a motive power has been discovered to possess extraordinary advantages: a machine appended to a steam-engine will generate gas sufficient to supply as much power as the ordinary furnaces. An extraordinary fact we may mention, as an evidence of the appreciation of its value by practical men, is, that the London and North-Western and the South-Eastern Railway Companies have already entered into contracts with the Electric Gas Company, to which they have affixed their respective common seals, for the use of the discovery for their locomotives.

POTATO CULTURE.—As your journal contains all the most useful and economical hints to cottagers and others in the cultivation of their produce, I venture to send you the result of an experiment—although, perhaps, already known and employed—with regard to early potatoes. I dug the walnut-leaved, and an early round potato, somewhat like "Foxes," the beginning of July, grown in the open but sheltered ground, and instead of throwing away the haulms I re-planted them—i. e., those which had even the most minute tuber, say the size of a pea, left upon them. I simply laid them in the trench formed between the two adjoining rows of potatoes, and threw the earth over them: they remained about three weeks, when, on taking them up, I found a very fair crop of tubers had been re-produced, many fully equal in size to the largest taken on the first digging. I am not prepared to say that in a very dry season this result would have been attained, but this year I have undoubtedly had a most successful harvest from the replanted haulms. Your cottage friends who sell, perhaps, their earliest sorts of potatoes, would find it worth the trial, as they could keep up, by this means, a second supply for their own table.—Cottage Gardener.

HATCHING FISH.—Hatching eggs by artificial heat is well known and extensively practised in China, as is also the hatching of fish. The sale of spawn for this purpose forms an important branch of trade in China. The fishermen collect with care, on the margin and surface, the spawn of fish, which is then placed in an egg-shell, which has been fresh emptied, through a small hole, which is then stopped, and the shell is placed under a sitting fowl. In a few days the Chinese break the shell in warm water (warmed by the heat of the sun.) The young fish are then kept in water until they are large enough to be placed in a pond. This plan in some measure counteracts the great destruction of spawn by trolls, which have caused the extinction of many fisheries.—Martin's China.

IMPROVED STEAM GENERATOR.—Mr. G. A. Huddart, of Brynkr, Carnarvonshire, has patented a plan for expediting the generating of steam, by assisting the globules to rise and emerge as soon as formed. For this purpose, rotating curved blades are introduced into the boiler, or tubes of tubular boilers, worked by any motive-power, and a pump is employed to draw water from the upper level of the water, and force it at a lower one.

PREVENTION OF THE DEPOSIT IN STEAM BOILERS.—Referring to the plan for this object, as proposed by Mr. Ira Hill, Mr. J. Bevan, of the Bellfield Print Works, Rochdale, in the Glasgow Practical Mechanics' Journal, says: "I can vouch for the value of the preventive, having practised a similar method for some years with perfect success. Our water here, when used clean from the reservoirs, deposits a very fine coating of sulphate of lime. A few years ago we put up a new steam-engine, and this caused us to make entirely new arrangements for our boiler-water supply. We then took the water from the clean reservoir, as well as from some catch-water, after being used for washing prints. This washing-water was, of course, more or less charged with colouring matter or dye drugs—such as madder, sumach, logwood, and quercitron bark; and we now find, after using this coloured water for several years, that the boilers are as free from deposit, and as beautifully clean, as the first day of working; in fact, I think they are now in better order than ever, as the plates are quite smooth and black. Of course we require to blow off and clear from time to time, as a flocky precipitate forms in the boiler bottom but this is easily swept out with a common broom. This deposit is, I presume, a partly chemical and partly mechanical combination of the colouring matter with sulphate of lime. I was led to this idea from having some years ago pumped up the wash-wheel water from the dye-house, and mixed it with a mineral water pumped from a coal-mine, expecting to improve the quality by the mixture; the water was afterwards filtered. I was glad to find a marked improvement from this combination of the two impure waters—the one charged with colour, and the other with sulphate of iron and sulphate of lime. There was an immense deposit in the reservoir, where the mixture was left to settle.

GAS AND STEAM BOILER.—Mr. H. M. Lefroy, R.N., proposes a plan of constructing a boiler and furnaces in which all the gaseous products of the combustion of the fuel will be discharged into the bottom of the boiler, and thence pass, rising through the water (in which all the impurities they may carry from the furnace will be deposited), saturated with steam, through the steam chest into the steam cylinders; the molecules of the gases serving as the conductors of the calorific into the water, instead of radiating it, as at present, through the plates and tubes of the boiler, into the same body. The advantages attributed to this form of boiler and furnaces are: 1st. A great economy of fuel, resulting in two ways—namely, in an absolutely greater quantity of calorific being generated from a given quantity of fuel, and in the saving of that portion of it which at present passes up the funnel in combination with the gases, both in the latent and sensible form. 2ndly. A saving in the cost of the apparatus, due to a reduction of its weight and size, and to its increased durability. The size will be diminished from the smaller quantity of coal to be burnt, and from the greater rapidity of its combustion, which probably will vary with some power of the density of the supporter of combustion; and the durability will be much increased from no part whatever of the boiler being exposed to the direct action of the furnaces: and since probably nine-tenths of the whole elastic bodies which pass through the cylinders will be steam, condensation will still be applicable with advantage, on the condition of using a larger air-pump with the condenser than at present is necessary.

SUBSTITUTE FOR GUTTA PERCHA.—Dr. Riddell, officiating superintending surgeon of the Nizam's army, in making experiments on the Muddar plant of India (Asclepias gigantea), had occasion to collect the milky juice, and found that, as it gradually dried, it became tough and hard, like gutta percha. He was induced to treat the juice in the same manner as that of the gutta percha tree, and the result has been the obtaining a substance precisely analogous to gutta percha. Sulphuric acid chars it; nitric acid converts it into a yellow resinous substance; muriatic acid has but little effect upon it; acetic acid has no effect, nor has alcohol. Spirit of turpentine dissolves it into a viscid glue, which, when taken between the finger and thumb, pressed together, and then separated, shows numberless minute and separated threads. The foregoing chemical tests correspond exactly with the established results of gutta percha. It becomes plastic in hot water, and has been moulded into cups and vessels. It will unite with the true gutta percha. The muddar also produces an excellent fibre, useful in the place of hemp and flax. An acre of cultivation of it would produce a large quantity of both fibre and juice. The poorest land suffices for its growth, and no doubt, if well cultivated, there would be a large yield of juice, and a finer fibre. A nearly similar substance is procurable from the juice of the Euphorbia Tirucalli, only when it hardens after boiling it becomes brittle. The subject is most important: and if common hedge plants like the foregoing can yield a product so valuable, the demand for which is so certain quickly to outrun supply, a material addition will have been made to the productive resources of the country.—Journal of the Society of Arts.

BEATRICE D'ESTE.

In one of the apartments of the palace of Versailles, in the suite immediately under, and in communication with, that occupied by Louis XIII. himself, reposed a man, enfeebled in health but of a giant mind, who had just achieved the greatest triumph of his life. Armand Jean du Plessis, better known in history and romance as the Cardinal Richelieu, had just beaten down every barrier between himself and Power—had succeeded, by a bold and adroit manoeuvre, in persuading the king to banish Mary De Medici, the queen-mother, to Compeigne—and had obtained the royal promise that, thenceforth, without his will, nothing of moment should be executed by the ministry. It was, in short, the evening of the famous Tenth of November, ever afterwards known—from the manner in which the wily Cardinal had made his enemies' plots turn against themselves—as "The Day of the Dupes."

That day had been a stormy one, as far as the passions were concerned; and he, whose part it had been to "ride on the whirlwind," now lay, in deep repose, upon a couch which was placed before the ample and well-planned fire-place. No light in the apartment, save that fitfully cast up from the fire—not a sound. All was hushed, while the cardinal enjoyed the first slumber which his unquiet spirit had allowed him for a long time. It was the deep slumber of exhaustion. Mind and body had alike been overworked, and the quiet and dreamless sleep was alike grateful to both.

Even in the ante-chamber, where there usually is whispering, at least, all was hushed. The pages held their breath. The armed guards stood, sat, or lay at listless lengths, as if they were so many mutes. Every one there knew how necessary it was for their master's health that he should enjoy the refreshment of repose—more than one physician had solemnly declared as much—and as, albeit harsh to the many, Richelieu was generous, gentle, and even kind, to the few who tended on him in the household or on guard, good care was taken by all that their master should remain undisturbed.

Two or three times, with stealthy steps, a youth named Jean De Lisle went into the room wherein the cardinal reposed. Now he adjusted the cushion, so as to raise the sleeper's head; anon he arranged the fire so as to divert its glow from the face to the person of the cardinal. Silently did he glide into and from the apartment, and "He sleeps," given in the lowest of all possible whispers, was the only response he deemed it necessary to make to the questionings, more of looks than language, of his companions in the outer room.

Meantime, in the king's apartments, preparations had been made for a sumptuous banquet—one of the gorgeous entertainments which the thirteenth Louis had a passion for giving. Expectation was high on this occasion, for Cardinal Richelieu, who had just secured the proud position which he quitted but when he quitted life, was known to be one of the invited guests; and, while many were preparing, at the earliest opportunity, to pay homage to his greatness, all were curious to note how he should bear himself in that new position which made him virtual ruler of his country.

The hour had arrived. The guests had assembled. The king himself had entered. Richelieu was not there to receive him. The royal brow became clouded. Happily, St. Simon, the favourite, was at hand, and blandly suggested, that perhaps the cardinal had been detained by state affairs. A messenger was dispatched to summon him, and returned, in a few minutes, with his gay plumage somewhat ruffled. Inquiry was made as to the cause, and the answer was, that, on repairing to the cardinal's apartments, a malapert attendant, known to the complainant as Jean De Lisle, had not only forbidden personal access to his eminence, but had absolutely refused to convey any message to him. The king, amused rather than annoyed at this report, whispered to St. Simon that he was half inclined to go to Richelieu's rooms, and personally assure himself of the real cause of his absence. A monarch's wish is speedily in course of fulfilment. The king and the courtier stepped out of the gay saloon. Each threw a cloak over his rich dress, and immediately afterwards both had descended the stairs, and were at the door which opened from the main corridor into the suite of rooms occupied by Richelieu.

They met with exactly the same reception as De Lisle had given to the palace servant—no actual want of courtesy, but a firm refusal to admit any one into the privacy of his eminence, the cardinal, or even to convey any message to him.

"Not even from the king?" asked Louis.

"No," replied De Lisle; "not even from the king."

There was something at once exciting and inexplicable in this pertinacity, and Louis determined to solve the riddle.

"You will admit me?" said he, allowing his regal apparel and adornments to be seen from beneath the long roquelaire which covered him.

But the young man, albeit he bent his knee, as he recognised the monarch still declared that he dared not give admittance even to him.

What might have followed is uncertain—for sovereigns, like many of their subjects, do not become milder for being opposed—but at this moment the door of the inner apartment opened, and Richelieu stood opposite to the king. To him Louis turned, and, in a tone of anger, and with an air of chagrin, asked wherefore access to him had been refused? Jean De Lisle was called on to explain, and justified his conduct by stating that, seeing how much the health of the cardinal his master had been injured by want of needful repose he had ventured—on some small skill in medicine, and backed by the opinion of the physicians, that sleep must be obtained by some means, if health were to be preserved—he had ventured to mingle an opiate with his drink for the afternoon repast, and was unwilling, at any risk, to allow the slumber thus obtained to be disturbed. The cardinal, thanking De Lisle for the good he had wrought, and acknowledging how much he felt recruited by the repose he had obtained, entreated the king to pardon one whose fault had arisen out of the best motives.

Louis, whose fortune it had ever been to know many flatterers and but few friends, replied that, for his own part, he freely forgave what had been solely caused by regard for a minister whose life was so essential to the glory of France and the honour of her king.

"But," added he, "if this servitor of yours, thus faithful, affectionate, and bold, will enter our service, we may show him, better than by mere words how much we esteem such fidelity, affection, and courage."

Jean De Lisle looked at Richelieu, who motioned him to kneel before the king. The jewelled hand of the monarch was graciously extended, and reverently kissed.

"Next to our own person," said Louis. "Ever at hand, and as vigilant for us as thou hast been for the cardinal."

Thus, in a moment, the page of Richelieu was made one of the gentlemen of the king. This done, Louis and the cardinal, followed by St. Simon and De Lisle, proceeded to the presence-chamber, where, of course, all proper homage was paid to the nominal and the actual possessor of power.

Thus ended the famous "Journées des Dupes." The king lost his mother, and gained a page. The cardinal obtained sovereign sway and a sound sleep.

Jean De Lisle was fortunate in having, from his childhood, been favoured with the protection of Cardinal Richelieu. When, at the age of two-and-twenty, Armand Jean du Plessis was made Bishop of Luçon, his elevation was attributable, in some degree, to the friendship of the Count De Lisle, then in the service and honoured with the confidence of Henry IV. He had known Armand's family, had received kindness from them, and was happy in being able to return it, in some degree, by recommending his friend as well qualified, from ability, no less than a taste for letters, for the vacant see. In doing this, he had given the first impetus to the fortunes of him who, as Cardinal and Duc de Richelieu, fills many a page in the annals of France. But the elder De Lisle died suddenly—even before his royal master fell under the knife of the fanatic, Ravallac—and bequeathed his only son to the friendship of Richelieu. The trust had been faithfully executed. The best education of the time had been bestowed upon Jean De Lisle, and for some years past he had occupied a place in the confidence and near the person of his patron. He had been page, until he had outgrown all appearance of such an office, and had latterly been more of an aide-de-camp—for, like the king, the cardinal affected the protective state of a body-guard of his own—and his skill in all warlike exercises well qualified him for a post at once so important and confidential. It has already been told with what devotedness he showed himself in the service of the cardinal.

The change which had taken place in his position, while it placed him immediately in attendance on the king, did not weaken his attachment to the cardinal. Grateful for the notice constantly and kindly taken of him by the king, a warm attachment for his majesty sprang into De Lisle's mind; and when Louis perceived this—his amour propre somewhat flattered by the constant evidence of such affection—he, in turn, began to feel an interest in the young cavalier. Is that wonderful? Is it not much to know, that even one heart cherishes esteem, regard, and love for you? The confidence which Louis placed in De Lisle was great, as may be judged from a circumstance which is now to be related.

After the queen-mother's enforced departure, some of her suite remained in Paris; but, when the cardinal had reason to believe that some of them so remained as spies, he peremptorily named a day before which each and all of them should quit Paris, and determined that, without any exception, such as were not natives of France should return to their proper birth-land.

Beatrice D'Este, a maiden of exalted rank and extreme beauty, was one of the ladies thus destined, by the cardinal's supreme will, to return home. She had been sent on a visit to Mary De Medici, about two years before, and by her had been treated as a friend and equal.

The retinue which was to escort her was placed under the command of Jean De Lisle. It was part of the king's policy, as counselled by Richelieu, to maintain the appearance of perfect respect towards the banished queen-mother; and he well knew that she would be pleased to learn that her favourite friend, the young Beatrice, had been sent back to her Italian home under the protection of the trustiest and most confidential of all his younger men-at-arms.

They left Paris. The power of Richelieu, which few dared dispute, had obtained a safe conduct for the party through Germany and the Italian States. Pleasant enough was the journey, made in easy stages, from a desire not to fatigue the lady. Soon, thrown into constant, hourly communion with her, as the leader of her escort, De Lisle had learned how powerful are the bonds which association forges. Had he seen Beatrice at the court of King Louis, he might have passed her by without notice; for who, amid a galaxy, will single out one "bright, particular star?"—but here, and thus, ever at her side, vigilant for her safety, careful for her comforts, anxious to amuse her, he had opportunity for learning that the maiden had greater beauty than that of form or feature—that her mind was bright with intelligence—that she was a being to be loved, even, though, he feared, she was too far above him for hope, the castle-builder, to fancy as within his reach. With the damsel the case was not very dissimilar. Beatrice D'Este had unconsciously permitted the young cavalier to have an interest in her heart, had accustomed herself to take pleasure in his society, was pleased to see with what grace he sat his horse, was charmed with the frankness of his conversation, was puzzled at thinking whether she had seen any other young noble of such manifold merits, and did not care to meditate on the improbability that, this journey ended, she might never again behold him.

Forward they went. Through France, into Germany. Soon was imperial Innsbruck left behind—next the Julian Alps were passed—and then they went down by Treviso, and through learned Padua. At last they were within the territory of Ferrara, where the journey was to terminate. Scarcely had the little cavalcade entered that territory, when an event of some importance took place.

Beatrice D'Este, niece to Alfonso II., of Ferrara—the prince whose harsh treatment of Torquato Tasso has given him an infamous memory—had been sent to Paris, by desire of certain of the nobility most devoted to the house of Este, in order to obtain the influence of Mary De Medici in her favour. On Alfonso's death, without a male heir, Pope Clement VIII. had declared that the papal fiefs held by the house of Este had lapsed to the church. Duke Cesar, who had succeeded Alfonso, surrendered the ecclesiastical fiefs, but retained possession of those which were held under the Empire. The nobility of Ferrara, who disliked him for his illegitimate birth, submitted to his retention of Modena and Regio, but were much disinclined to allow him to rule over themselves. On the other hand, they objected to being transferred to the dominion of the Church, and had secretly solicited Mary De Medici to assert the claims of Beatrice D'Este to the fiefs of Ferrara, which her family had held so long. Before Mary was exiled to Compeigne, she had not been able to bring the subject, as its importance required, before the favourable notice of her son, Louis XIII. Far and near as his espionage extended, Richelieu could not remain ignorant of the pretensions of Beatrice. While they were not asserted for her, or by her, he saw no cause for interference. It happened, rather singularly, that the person most interested cared little for the honours which her friends wished to restore to her. Beatrice D'Este would have much preferred the quietude of retirement to the gilded pomps of such a sovereignty as that of Ferrara.

The Castle of Este, not very far from Padua, was still held for Beatrice, as portion of the property which had been the dowry of her mother. Thither the travelling party were now speeding—two of them rather mournful, it must be confessed, at the thought that there would terminate the acquaintance and companionship which both had found so pleasant. However, they were not destined to part quite so soon.

Italy was overrun at that time by gangs of robbers, who had pretty good information respecting travellers of note, the course they meant to take, and the property they carried with them. In the vicinity of Este, one of these lawless gangs had located. The little party commanded by De Lisle had scarcely entered the defile leading to the castle, when it was suddenly attacked by these armed ruffians. The assailants were superior in numbers; but the gallantry of the French men-at-arms prevailed, and the robbers were beaten off, with heavy loss. Jean De Lisle was seriously wounded in the melee, and it was fortunate for him that the Castle of Este was so near the place of contest.

It is scarcely necessary to say, that within those walls De Lisle received every attention which his sufferings required. Months elapsed ere he was convalescent; and the French escort under his command had long since been dismissed. Beatrice D'Este certainly did not neglect the young champion who had suffered so much in her cause. But latterly, as his strength became renewed, and it was evident that he would be able to return to Paris before long, the maiden grew unusually thoughtful; more addicted to solitary musings than of yore, and evidently making efforts—not always very successfully—to give as little of her society to De Lisle as strict courtesy could warrant. Love, without her having dreamed of such a thing, had become the inmate of her bosom. Her female attendants, with the natural shrewdness and sympathy of their sex and age, had observed this long before she had even a suspicion how the case stood; but then "the lookers-on see more of the game than the players."

The day of departure was named. Beatrice, heart-weary with the tumult of conflicting feelings, had withdrawn from all human observation, and had taken a favourite seat on the flat roof of her habitation. It was in the soft and gentle twilight; and hither, at that hour, she had long been wont to come, with her embroidery, her lute, her pencil, or her book. But now they were all neglected. The impassioned lines of poetry were in her hand; page after page had been turned over and gazed at, but she knew not what the pages said. Her abstraction was so great, that she neither heard nor heeded the familiar footstep by her side. The whispered "Beatrice!" awakened her from her soft day-dream, and she startled, with a blush and a quickened pulse, when she saw that her solitude was disturbed by him of whom she had been thinking.

Silence for a season—oh, who will say that such silence is voiceless? Then came the hurried words of thanks for kindnesses given and received; last of all, the "Farewell!" To speak that word, De Lisle had now sought this audience. The morrow's eve was to see him far away from Este and all it contained. She knew it. Still she made no answer. Listlessly did the fair hand droop, as it held the volume which had been unread that evening. The volume dropped from that little hand. De Lisle took it up, saw that her name was written in it, pressed his lips to that dear name and delicate writing, and put the volume into his bosom. Paler grew the lady's cheek—softer became the gentle beauty of those dark eyes, at once liquid and lustrous. And then, in flattering words, De Lisle repeated the thanks he had already spoken for all the courtesy he had received. Last came the "Farewell!"

"You will think of Este—sometimes?" said the princess.

"As Adam remembered the Eden he had quitted, and never hoped to see again!"

"You will think of those whom you have known in Este?—you have many friends within these walls."

"It is impossible that I can forget. The time I have so happily passed here will stand in my memory, amid the wastes of future days, a green spot which no sirocco can destroy."

"Ah!" said she, with a gentle smile, "you will some day return hither, if it be only for an hour, to let me know that the wounds you received in my defence have not seriously injured you?"

"Never!" he exclaimed. "I dare not return. I look upon Este and its mistress for the last time."

He approached her. Not to crowned empress could he have bent a lowlier knee. He took the white hand which hung by her side, and raised it to his lips. Marble-cold was the touch. He looked anxiously upon the maiden's face—it was white and rigid as the Parian bust. She had fainted. By degrees the colour returned, and those coral lips and sunny cheeks once again flushed up with life—the eyes resumed their light—a rosy hue suffused brow, face, and neck—the little hand, now warm and flexible, made an effort for release. But in that brief time De Lisle had been thrilled with impulsive hope—sudden, but strong. He still knelt by her side. The hand which he retained in his ventured to press—the pressure was not reproved—perhaps it was returned. A flood of tears relieved the concentrated passion of the maiden's heart. Her head reclined upon his shoulder—she raised it, and looked into his eyes. What soft confession in that look! Then—but who can describe the indescribable?

Jean De Lisle did not quit the Castle of Este on the morrow, as he had proposed.

But how answer to King Louis for the default?

Cardinal Richelieu sat in the very apartment in which, some months before, he had reposed on "The Day of the Dupes," when Jean De Lisle had prevented the King's entrance. Before him was a newly-arrived letter. The king occupied a chair opposite to his minister.

The cardinal cut the silken floss which encircled the missive, broke the seal, and silently read the letter. He smiled. The king said:

"Good news, my lord?"

"As your majesty may take it," answered Richelieu. "From this letter, which has reached me within the hour, I learn that our protégé, De Lisle, has relieved us of the trouble of caring further for his fortunes. He has wooed and won the Princess Beatrice D'Este, and acquaints me that he solicits, and awaits your royal permission to wed her. If I know him well, as I think I do, he will wed her whether that permission be given or withheld. Rome, as I learn from these other dispatches, is most anxious to retain the fief Ferrara, which it resumed on the death of Duke Alfonso without legitimate male heir. Methinks that by permitting Jean De Lisle to wed the daughter of Este, which would for ever annihilate her claims to the sovereignty, we may please the Holy See, and, by representing the union as of our own suggestion, with a view to thus securing the continued possession of the fief to the Church, we may gain as an equivalent the concession we have so long sought in the matter of nominating to the French Seas."

"Be it so," answered the king. "But what will the newly-wedded have to live upon?"

"The Princess Beatrice," said Richelieu, "has the rich dowry of her mother, equal to the estates of any Duke in France."

"I am glad of it," said the king; "but we must not send a barren message to De Lisle. We must retain him as a subject of France, by giving him a Huguenot's confiscation. And should he bring his bride to Paris, assure her of a favourable reception."

"No doubt!" observed the cardinal. "Your majesty has a paternal regard for youth and beauty!"

The Count De Lisle never returned to France. He and his Beatrice lived and died at Este. They were happy in their lives, and it is recorded that their death took place, even as they desired, on one and the same day.

ESSAYS.

No. OXOVIL.—THE ALOE BLOOMS BUT ONCE IN A HUNDRED YEARS.

TAKING a stroll one day in the outskirts of this wonderful metropolis, we arrived opposite a quaint-looking house. It was one of those solid, brick-built mansions, the taste for which came in with the assumption of the throne of these realms by a Dutchman, his successor, the last of the Stuart sovereigns—and the Act of Parliament imported Georges I. and II. It was massive, but heavy and dismal—quite a type of the Teutonic dispensation with which we were favoured at the expiration of one era and the commencement of another. Between a pair of ponderous wooden gates ran some iron railings, carefully interlaced with wire breast-high, to keep out the dogs; and on peering through this remarkably ugly fence, we perceived a patch of sullen-looking grass, and in the centre of the plot a dingy aloe plant. We could not help thinking that the cheerless symbol of grief harmonised with the sullen appearance of the habitation. King William, Queen Anne, and the two Georges, and the substantial people who had occupied the house, and who, no doubt, had a voice in the politics of the time, were all dead—and here was this aloe, attached to the soil by very feeble roots, surviving to tell us that the apple of life but holds the ashes of bitterness and sorrow. This melancholy feeling was heightened by our knowledge that this unsocial-looking plant delights to grow upon rocks, in dry sand, and amidst a burning atmosphere breathed by lions and tigers. It also flourishes in deserted cities, and creeps snake-like through deserts where once the cheerful voice of man was heard in rich cadence. While thus meditating, the old gardener approached, and said, through the railings:

"That is an American aloe, sir; it was in bloom last year."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, sir. It was quite a curiosity; thousands came to see it, for you see, sir, the American aloe don't bloom but once in a hundred years."

After a little more gossip we went on our way, headfull of speculations upon the early history of America, the Aztec Lilliputians, and the probable origin of the aboriginal inhabitants of that vast continent. In a little while we calmed down a little, and began to repeat to ourselves the remark which had fixed our attention: "The American aloe blooms but once in a hundred years." The information was not new to us, but having just seen a specimen of the plant invested with such an extraordinary property, the impression it had created was more than casual—it was profound. We immediately thought, what will be the aspect of the world in 1952, when this bitter-tasting plant may be expected to again shoot up, from the centre of its thick leaves, tender stems covered with flowers. What the world was when it last put forth emblems of vitality, we all well know. We are perfectly aware that in those days Turkey and France were the greatest powers in Europe; Spain ranked above Britain, and that our own dear land was convulsed with agitation, and the Hanoverian dynasty scarce worth a year's purchase.

The people, also, were sunk in ignorance and barbarism, they had no political rights, corruption reigned paramount in high quarters, and the nation, struggling as it was, under a load of internal difficulties, through the family ties of its sovereign, became fatally and ruinously involved in the affairs of the continent. The American republic had not then been established, the British possessions in India were limited to the sea-coast, and at home we had a population of not more than seven millions. In 1852, Great Britain and Ireland had an aggregate population of not less than twenty-seven millions, and in the whole empire there were at least two hundred millions—a fifth of the population of the earth. Great Britain stood confessedly at the head of nations—Russia, which in 1742 played no serious part in the politics of Europe, had been advanced to the second position—France occupied the third place, Austria the fourth, and Turkey the last. Besides all these powers, one had sprung up in the west, with a promise of being, at some time or another—probably not a very distant one—the mistress of the destinies of mankind, not only for generations, but centuries. Therefore, with all our knowledge of the past, and intimate acquaintance with the present, dare we ask ourselves what we think will be the condition of the political world and of society in 1952—when that aloe, so lately decked with flowers, will again put forth its scentless columns of bloom, to excite in the sensitive and reflecting far more awe than admiration?

This is not the age of vaticination, but it is essentially that of speculation. And as the doctrine of probabilities is capable of mathematical demonstration, we may be allowed—or so might any one similarly influenced—to fall into a half-musing, half-dreaming frame of mind, and endeavour to fancy what description of year that 1952 is likely to be?

It is just a century hence. Few living now will be in existence then; but there will be a few—for, as now almost every year we are informed of a centenarian taking his or her farewell of the pains or pleasures of this life, so there is a strong probability that, a hundred years hence, many babes living now, will be living men and women then; but as an average generation among the inhabitants of these islands is only thirty-three years, it follows that, before that time shall have arrived, three generations of the aggregate population of this kingdom will have passed away—child, grandchild, and great grandchild, will have all been gathered in the tomb—before the opening of that inscrutable 1952. But notwithstanding this repelling fact, with the experiences of the past before us, and narrowly observing the indications of the present, we may consistently place ourselves on the centre of the bridge of passing time, and attempt to discern some of the hues of that future, stretching illimitably beyond the horizon, built up like a huge wall, to prevent our peering too curiously into a territory in which our vested interest will be dust and ashes, and, for every nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand of us, oblivion.

A poet to whom some glimpses of futurity were permitted, has said that Coming events cast their shadows before.

We believe it—for the law of sequences may be laid down with precision, and what the sceptical would place in the category of guesses, are really well-founded anticipations. So that it is not unreasonable to speculate upon the aspect of the world a hundred years hence. In the first place, then, what, probably, will be the territorial divisions of the earth at the end of that period? Turkey, most assuredly, will have long ceased to exist. Already she is staggering under the weight of many crimes. Her rude strength and barbaric valour are exhausted. Having despised the arts and sciences, she must now fall before the sweep of their avenging scythes. Besides, the mission of the Turks in Europe was accomplished, when they swept away the last remnants of the old Roman empire. Ever afterwards they were intruders, aliens in blood, language, and social discipline, to the soil of Europe. But who, in 1952, will reign at Constantinople in their stead—the Russians, or some new and intermediate power? The twelve millions of Christians at present in Turkey desire the latter; but Russia is too powerful to permit a new enemy to take up a dangerous position on its southern frontier, and thus effectually arrest its march to the shores of the Mediterranean, and prevent the realisation of the ambitious dream of centuries. No! Destiny and circumstances, visible as the stars flashing in beauty on a cloudless night, point to Russia as the destroyer of the Turkish empire, and the creator of new and startling conditions in the history of mankind. The spirit of aggrandisement in Russia is not local—it is national. It is not confined to the Czar and the nobles, but pervades all classes of the Russian community: priests, tradesmen, and peasants are as much inspired by it as the army—which, after the ancient fashion, marches to battle under the cross, and to music breathing the conviction that "God commands it." The advance of such a people is natural and inevitable. They are rushing to the sea, the element on which the future destinies of the world are to be decided. Whatever nation has the empire of the sea, has virtually the whole earth for its empire. This Russia instinctively understands.

As the roll of civilisation is westward, the ocean must for ages be the great highway of nations. In time—perhaps in 1952—the sea must certainly yield precedence to the air; ballooning to the coming mode of transit is what the humble tea-kettle was to the fertile brain of the improver of the steam-engine. But until that time arrives, the sea must be considered as the magnetised link between the east and the west—the azure main on whose bosom will occur the events that will determine the character of future human experiences. Russia has accepted this doctrine in its full significance, and it is instructive to dwell on the fact, that the whole course of Muscovite history has been a frantic struggle to reach the sea.

So late as the middle of the sixteenth century, the Russians had no ports except Archangel, in the White Sea, which the English had discovered for them. They were shut out from the rest of the world. Ivan IV. first broke through this isolation, by descending to the mouths of the Volga, and establishing himself on the shores of the Caspian Sea. Peter the Great, at the opposite extremity of the Russian dominions, founded St. Petersburg, and so brought his empire in communication with the seas of the western world. The great Catherine made a splendid march southward, and Russia was mistress of the Black Sea. In short, the whole course of Russian policy has been to devour all the land which lay between Moscow and the sea—so that, by a consecutive series of occupations, the empire might be extended in all directions, but more especially towards Constantinople, the Mediterranean, and the East Indies.

Upon a dispassionate review of all these achievements, and a calm consideration of present appearances and tendencies, it may safely be predicted, that in 1952 Russia will be one of the mightiest nations the world ever saw. By the conquest of Turkey, her southern capital will be at Constantinople—her northern will still remain at St. Petersburg. By the subjugation of Persia—another worn-out Mussulman nation—she will have acquired the Persian Gulf, and thus be enabled, not only to participate in the commerce of the East, but send war fleets to the shores of India, and through the passes of Cabul pour prodigious armies on the plains of India, where unquestionably the contest for the empire of the Old World will eventually be determined. But in this diffusion of her enormous strength will be found Russia's greatest weakness. She will become enervated by success. While basking in the luxuriant regions of the south and east, she will be apt to forget the dreary north from which she sprang; and thus there will be presented once more to the world, the spectacle of an empire with two capitals, and, consequently, divided interests, being first separated into moieties, and then each part gradually crumbling away into many distinct nationalities.

However, a century hence we anticipate for Russia the most astounding greatness. She will be in antagonism with the other half of the earth, and no less than four-fifths of the aggregate population of that period. But when she has purged the world of Mahomedanism—a mission she has accepted, and to which she seems to have been appointed—she will be encountered by influences stronger, purer, and more spiritual, than those which inspired her to go forth to conquer and to obtain dominion. In the East she will be met by a people who, emancipated from the forms of centuries, will, for the first time in their career, have fairly and cheerfully entered into the bosom of the great human family. The recent revolutions in China must create a tremendous revolution in the affairs of the East. The circumstance of two hundred millions of people springing, as it were, from the grave, must thrill through all nations like an electric shock. It must quicken the pulse of human energy, and if it has gone fast before, make it go inconceivably faster. And when we come to consider that China has a sea-coast of three thousand six hundred miles in length, we are introduced to the suggestion, that a new commerce of vast extent is on the eve of being inaugurated, and that, a century hence, it is probable that it will only be second to that enjoyed by those superb maritime communities who have not only changed the face of the world, but made it look more beautiful and heavenly. China renovated and China Christianised will, therefore, present to Russia an insurmountable barrier in the East: it will be the great wall against which all her prowess will be exerted in vain. If to this new power we add the large islands in the Eastern seas—the Japan group, for instance, all highly susceptible to the truths of Christianity—which will have been brought within the pale of civilisation, we can easily imagine a gigantic array of interests totally irreconcilable with, and impervious to, the ambitious designs of Russia, in those fruitful and densely-populated regions of the East which have so long been the wonder and mystery of the rest of the inhabitants of the world.

The tendencies of politics, and the movements of races and nations, then, seem to demonstrate that the conquests of Russia would strictly be confined to Europe and Western Asia. Now, for England and civilisation, the question arises—Will she, in the year 1952, have menaced or occupied any portion of India? Being in possession of the Cabul passes—those gates through which so many ruthless conquerors have passed—she may have invaded India, d la Tamerlane; but unless she had the sovereignty of the seas, she would not be in a condition for retaining permanent possession of any place east of the Indus. Now, as we shall presently show that in 1952 another power will be undisputed mistress of the oceans of the globe, it follows, that as India cannot be retained by any power whose sole supremacy is on the land, it must inevitably belong to that nation, or that community of interests, whose march—to quote the language of poetry—"is on the wave, whose home is on the deep." For the future, therefore, the greatest maritime power of the age must be at the head of all the empires of that age—in fact, be the arbiter-general of the affairs of the whole human race. India being essentially a link in that naval supremacy, can never belong to Russia, until she has established for herself a commerce superior in point of importance to that of Western Europe and America combined. That, even our limited powers of vaticination enable us to say will never happen; for, before the Russians could possibly have a superior command at sea, the Anglo-Saxon race must have long ago been exterminated: that it at present is the most vigorous, healthful, and promising, it needs no ghost from the grave to tell us.

It being conceded that Russia, a century hence, will be a mighty nation, our thoughts naturally turn with fond affection to those states of Western Europe, which have created modern civilisation, and are brilliantly contributing to the advancement of the whole of the human family.

There is Austria, rich in numbers but poor in character. Oppressed with bigotry and ignorance, she cannot possibly survive another century. Her political and moral soil are volcanic. The eruption even now is imminent; and when it does come, we have a strong impression that out of the ashes of Austrian authority, there will spring an empire extending from the Rhine to the Vistula, and embracing within its limits not only the modern kingdoms and principalities of Germany, but Hungary and what are now termed the Danubian provinces of Turkey—so as to oppose in the West an impassable barrier to the march of Russia. This great empire would be a Germany, instinct with the highest intelligence, the loftiest patriotism, and the best developments of which the age would be capable. It is only allowed us to pray for its realisation; but we nevertheless think it not only possible, but very probable. Then, upon the dismemberment of the Austrian federation, there would be Italy to be disposed of. Now, though that beautiful land is invested with a thousand glorious traditions—though its soil teems with countless stirring memoirs of the past—we cannot shut our eyes to the impression that its regeneration is hopeless under Italian rule. Its very traditions are to it an Old Man of the Mountain, which it would scarcely attempt to shake off its shoulders. No—Italy appears destined to be incorporated with another state, its people fused with another people. And here geography and circumstances indicate France as its future mistress.

The populations of Spain and Portugal are in a similar position. Their institutions are an incubus, and no better fate could befall them than an incorporation in a federation, including Belgium and Holland, of which the more youthful, energetic, and largest state—France—should be the head. This would give France—the natural guardian of the Mediterranean—a position which would more than counterbalance the conquests of Russia in Europe and Asia Minor. At all events, it would neutralise its power on the waters of the Mediterranean, and relieve England from a guardianship more costly than beneficial to her vital interests. Should Russia persevere in her ulterior views of aggrandisement—as there is not the slightest doubt she will—some such arrangement will be necessary and inevitable. The moment Russia has seized upon Constantinople, England, in sheer self-defence, will pounce upon Egypt—and then France, in the mêlée that will ensue, will develop her schemes of conquest; so that, a hundred years hence, the probabilities are all in favour of the map of Europe being strangely altered, and France ranking as the first of the continental powers. There would be nothing unnatural in this—for France, as regards its resources in population and mere physical material, is still a young country. As an organised state, it is not so old as England; and on all hands it must be admitted that, owing to her wretched government, her ruinous wars, and the recent date of her commercial relations with other countries, she has not had that fair share of prosperity and of dominion among the nations of the world to which she is entitled by her genius, activity, and splendid position. Such an union would be less powerful, as affecting England, than the Spanish empire was under Charles V.; and, considering the exigencies which are fast arising, it could not be considered in any other light than an immense advantage. England and France are each rapidly discarding their old and insane ideas of rivalry and enmity. They are beginning mutually to feel that in the political world their interests are identical, and that all rancour, grudges, and jealousies between them are nothing more than outrages of the law of Providence and the gospel common to both, which teaches them to know and do better. We may reasonably conclude, then, that in 1952 France and England will be in close and loving alliance—that France will be quite as great as Russia in the extended circumference of the politics denominated European—and that England will be—ay, what will England be—what will that astonishing year we are doomed never to see, exhibit England as being? That is the question.

Now we must frankly contend that such a question neither puzzles the will nor makes fools of any of the other senses. The lamp that lights Russia on her mission, must also light England; and no sentiment of national vanity dictates the assertion, that we are prepared to prove, by a very common-sense working of the rule of probabilities, that in 1952 England will not only continue to be the foremost nation of the earth, but, through her family connections spread all over the world, as supremely grand and magnificent then, as she is great and majestic now. The current of destiny which runs through all nations, through all society—barbarous as well as civilised—through races, individuals, and circumstances, cannot be turned from its course, except by a decree from a Power on High. Therefore, seeing how the current is running, and whither it is tending, we are justified in anticipating for England an ultimate condition as magnificent as the mind of the largest-brained and best-educated man could imagine.

But, as the American also that suggested this article will bloom a hundred years hence, we must confine ourselves to the probable England of that period—being content with the remark, that we do not believe that then she will have attained the culminating point in her greatness; for, travel as fast as she may, she has more work to accomplish than she could conveniently cram into five hundred years. The speculation, therefore, to be entertained is, what is it likely the England of 1952 will be? The population claims the first attention.

The natural rate of increase of population in these islands is about one per cent. per annum: so that, if allowed to accumulate without interruption for a century, it would not be less, in 1952, than sixty millions; but, inasmuch as emigration, and a variety of causes incidental to commerce and manufactures, lessen that rate by almost one half, assuming the population now to be twenty-seven millions, at the end of the century it would be about forty millions. The money value of these twenty-seven millions is represented by a capital of four thousand millions of pounds—which gives about £148 per head as the average value of every man, woman, and child at present in the United Kingdom. Now, if we suppose that this capital accumulates at the rate of five per cent. per annum, at simple interest alone, at the end of another century the money value of the forty millions would not be less than twenty-four thousand millions of pounds—which would give, as the average value of each and every inhabitant, the sum of five hundred pounds: thus showing that it is practicable, in the course of one hundred years—supposing the permanency of the present rate of prosperity—to improve the condition of every individual in the proportion of three and a half to one. The majority would not be benefited to that extent; but, as the working classes of that day would have a clearer knowledge of themselves and their interests, they would be in a position to command a more adequate share of the profits of labour and production, than those of the present day receive. Owing to the increase of population, and the consequent rise in the prices of commodities all over the world, the forty thousand millions might not be much richer—or, we should say, be worth more—than the present twenty-seven millions are; but, as there is no precedent for provisions being more than trebled in price in the course of a hundred years, and in the presence of the fact, that every year the facilities for the production of manufactures are wonderfully multiplied—and of course the cost lessened in proportion—it is only reasonable to expect, that every one of the forty millions will be worth just double what every one of the present twenty-seven millions is—or, in round numbers, be valued at just £300 per head: so that the wealth of the country, measured by the prices of the day, would be not less than £12,000,000,000! which, at five per cent., would yield a yearly income of six hundred millions of pounds.

But for the sake of our argument, we must take the previous figures, and say, that in the year 1952 it is quite possible and probable for England to have a population of forty millions, represented by a money value of twenty-four thousand millions—or just double the amount of the value of all Europe in the present year. What a prodigious array of figures! What a stupendous mass of accumulations to be garnered up in one little nook of the earth! But that would be only the gross material results. Piled behind them, like a rampart of metal purer than virgin gold, would be the men and women of the United Kingdom—the valour, the beauty, the energy, the virtue, the genius, and soul-reaching and ennobling purposes of the bravest and fairest of that indomitable Anglo-Saxon race, to whom the Almighty seems to have delegated the task of putting round the globe a girdle of human beings matchless for bone, sinew, and nerve, volume of brain, and bold, unshrinking resolve of heart. Then there would be the English settlements in both hemispheres. Many of them, most likely, would not be colonies—they would be large independent states; but the bonds of affection and interest would be only drawn the closer, and the connection with the mother country, as with the United States of the present day, be more extended and more reciprocally advantageous.

Verily the England of 1952 will be a splendid marvel. She will be the blooming mother of a hundred nations; but the greatest marvel of that year will be found on the continent of America, along the shores of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and amid those lovely islands of the Southern Seas, which the enterprise of English navigators opened up to the knowledge of the western world. In those vast regions, the Anglo-Saxon race will be found in their meridian glory—the most numerous, the most compact, the most civilised of the human family.

There are in the world, in this year, not less than sixty millions of Anglo-Saxons. Now, as they are doubled in number in half a century, in 1952 they will have swelled to the enormous amount of two hundred and forty millions! Two hundred and forty millions of human beings, all speaking one language, borrowing inspiration from one literature, contributing equally to the store-house of science, animated by kindred sentiments, worshipping at the same shrine, and all and each of them indefatigably contributing to the fulfilment of the mission specially given to the race, to renovate, consolidate, enlighten, strengthen, and Christianise the sons and daughters of Adam, so that, in the appointed time, they would be indeed the sons and daughters of the bright and heavenly morning!

What a prodigious family! The mind staggers under the bare conception of its magnificence, and we pause to glance at some of its coming incidents, in their sober entirety. Upon a moderate computation, one hundred and fifty millions of this population will be located on the continent of America. A vast proportion of it will be a maritime population, situated on the shores of the Pacific, where Liverpools and New Yorks will send out their ships to trade with the islands of the Pacific Ocean, with Australia and New Zealand, and, further westward, with Japan, China, Burmah, India, and even Persia, although a Russian province. From these promises of a future which has already peered above the horizon, it is quite manifest that the British and the Anglo-Saxons in America and our present Australasian group of colonies, will be lords of the seas in the southern world; and that, whether India be independent—which is very unlikely—or British or American, it can never possibly be Russian. So that, as regards that apprehension, it is very remote; the aspect of the present guarantees to posterity that it will never be realised.

And now, having travelled the world round to find a character for that certain-to-be grand and extraordinary year 1952, we may consistently conclude with the exclamation, that in its practical, moral, and intellectual aspects, its promises give—even to us, so remote from it—distinct, though prophetic views of its unparalleled grandeur. In the physical regions created and controlled by man, there will undoubtedly be many stupendous revelations. In travelling, whether on land or water, the people of that day will call us slow, as we call those who lived a century ago slow. The voyage to New York will probably be effected in two days; to India or Australia in eleven; which would be just at the rate of about sixty miles an hour—the present speed attainable on an English railway. Fresh powers will have been brought into requisition, and probably, instead of travelling by steam, it will be by electricity. The resources of science are inexhaustible; and even the present generation may live long enough to see a motive power that pervades the universe made more serviceable to humanity than it is in transmitting messages or precipitating metals.

But whatever the agent employed may be, the law of deduction applied to the realisations of the present authorises us to pronounce in favour of the opinion, that a hundred years hence all the families of the earth will have been drawn closer together; and, as a consequence, those interests, ideas, and sentiments which are now local, made to contribute to a common fund, which shall in time produce the true cosmopolitan idea which philosophers have dreamed about, and poets, in their noble ardour, eulogised. The ægis of a purer wisdom will be extended over at least Europe and America, and the press on both continents, in its action, be a mutual exposition of a wide-spread determination to approach nearer to that Divine universal law which, sooner or later, must regulate the conduct of all mankind. The arts, sciences, and literature will be developed to a condition of Titanic magnificence—the life of man prolonged far beyond the meagre limits of threescore and ten years—the outer and inner existence of every member of the human circle of intelligence have become purer, more spiritualised—and the Christianity which first laid the foundations, and whose charitableness object is to conduct modern civilisation to its utmost developments, be purged of all differences of opinion, relieved of all hideous excrescences, and so perfected in its discipline, as to shine throughout the whole earth as brightly and sweetly as doth the generous sun on hearts that can hymn gratefully, and beat to none but God-like impulses, whether their earthly lots be lowly or exalted.

JULLIEN'S EXTRAORDINARY DUEL.

JULLIEN was first noticed as leader of the concerts at the Jardin Turc, at Paris, since built over. A large house now stands where he once stood, as we have also so often seen him in London, with primrose gloves and shirt-cuffs turned up to the elbow, wielding the sceptre of king of the orchestra. It was during his reign at the Jardin Turc that, according to M. Lecomte, the following accident happened to him: "He had an extraordinary duel, unprecedented, save among Ariosto's fabulous heroes. One of his musicians, who had been fencing-master in a regiment, had a dispute with him, and sent him a challenge. Jullien asked a week to prepare for the duel, and his request was granted. At the end of that time the encounter took place with swords, and he received a furious thrust, which ran him right through the body, the hilt of the weapon actually resting upon the wound; and his antagonist having naturally let go his sword, Jullien rushed upon him, and in his turn dealt him a desperate blow, after which, having thus revenged himself, he remained erect, with a sword sticking out of his back! Nobody daring to withdraw it, he himself had the energy to pluck it from the wound. It had made itself a passage which, wonderful to relate, interfered with none of the organs essential to life. A month afterwards, Jullien had resumed his baton and his primrose gloves, and, pallid and in elegiac attitudes, he once more presided over those concerts to which the fame of his adventure now attracted all Paris. The circumstances which decided him to quit Paris were, like everything in his life, singular and out of the common way. Having some cause of complaint against the authorities, he revenged himself by the composition of an old posting bill, in which a combination of letters, put in larger type than the others, formed, when seen from a distance, a word offensive to the police. He had to run for it, and then it was he went to England."

FOOLHARDINESS.—At Fort Puntales, a cannon-shot from the enemy buried itself in the sand-bags in front of one of the buildings, and a second followed exactly in the same direction, not even widening the opening the first had made. A soldier belonging to a fatigue party of the 88th regiment, on seeing this, put the side of his head against the hole, simply saying to his comrades, "Now you shall see if they are good marksmen;" but the next shot that was fired, and every succeeding one for several minutes, went wide of the mark.

FACTIAL.

FISHING FOR A COMPLIMENT.—Dr. EMMONS ON PREACHING.—A young man having preached for the doctor one day, was anxious to get a word of applause for his labour of love. The grave doctor, however, did not introduce the subject, and his younger brother was obliged to bait the hook for him. "I hope, sir, I did not weary your people by the length of my sermon to-day?" "No, sir, not at all; nor by the depth either!" The young man was silent.

A fellow who was being led to execution told the officers they must not take him through a certain street, lest a merchant who resided there should arrest him for an old debt.

Dr. ROYLE tells us that the poor native of India smokes upon the bosom of his mother earth, by digging with his finger two small holes in a clay soil, and boring a tunnel between them with a piece of stick. He puts tobacco into one hole, lights it, and, lying down upon the ground, applies his mouth over the other.

"I guess you mean to bring up that are young one to be pretty sharp at a bargain," said a fellow to a woman who was rocking and singing with all her might to a "little responsibility." "Why?" said she. "Cause you keep bawling 'By low baby, by low baby,' into his ears all the time."

A FATAL REGION.—A couple of friends met near the Custom House one day, when, after the usual salutations, one said to the other: "Well, poor Horton is dead!"—alluding to one of their acquaintances who died suddenly. "Oh, yes, it's very sickly here; a great many have died here this year that never died before!"

A celebrated writer of vaudevilles, being caught in a shower, took refuge under a portico. A very pretty person soon lifted the window, and, after looking at him attentively for a moment, sent out a servant to him with an umbrella. The next day the delighted author dressed himself up to his last result of the problem of what was becoming, and, as the umbrella was an old one, laid it aside as a souvenir, and, purchasing a new one of the costliest taste, called on the lady to return her flattering loan. She received the new umbrella, evidently without remarking the change, and, after listening, with curious gravity, to the rather pressing tenderness of the dramatist's acknowledgments, she suddenly comprehended that he was enamoured of her, and forthwith naively explained, that as he had stood in the way of a gentleman who wished to come to see her, unobserved, she had sent him the umbrella to get him off the front steps!

An English writer tells of an enthusiastic disciple of Walton, who, chiding him on account of his vexation at not realising so much sport as he expected from angling, coolly told him that "he would never make an angler, if he could not fish a whole day in a bucket of water without showing impatience!"

A boy who was troubled with the toothache, determined to have it extracted; but there being no dentist living near, he resolved to do the job himself—whereupon he filled the cavity with powder, but, being afraid to touch it off, he put a slow match to it, and ran.

WHICH IS THE WEAKER SEX?—Females are called the weaker sex—but why? If they are not strong, who is? When men must wrap themselves in thick garments, and incase the whole in a stout overcoat to shut out the cold, women in thin silk dresses, with neck and shoulders bare, or nearly so, say they are perfectly comfortable! When men wear water-proof boots over woollen hose, and incase the whole in India-rubber to keep them from freezing, women wear thin silk hose and cloth shoes, and pretend not to feel the cold! When men cover their heads with furs, and then complain of the severity of the weather, women half-cover their heads with straw-bonnets, and ride twenty miles in an open carriage, facing a cold north-wester, and pretend not to suffer at all. They can sit, too, by men who smell of rum and tobacco-smoke, enough to poison a whole house, and not appear more annoyed than though they were a bundle of roses. Year after year they can bear abuses of all sorts from drunken husbands, as though their strength was made of iron. And then is not woman's mental strength greater than man's? Can she not endure suffering that would bow the stoutest man to the earth? Call not woman the weaker vessel; for had she not been greater than man, the race would long since have been extinct. Hers is a state of endurance which man could not bear.

CATECHISM FOR YOUNG GIRLS WHO WISH TO BE MARRIED.—A few weeks since two Paris booksellers appeared before the Tribunal of Correctional Police of that city, to dispute the ownership of a singular morsel of literature, entitled "Instructions to Grown Girls who wish to be Married." In the course of the proceedings some passages of the catechism were read, which caused great amusement. The following is a specimen: "What is the most useful of all things for grown girls?—Matrimony. At what age ought girls to marry?—According as they are pretty. At what age ought the prettiest girls to marry?—At 16 or 18 years. But if they are not pretty, at what age?—Whenever they can get a lover; they must not lose an opportunity. When a girl has not a lover, what must she do to get one?—There are many means. What are those means?—First, she must have prudence and modesty; second, she must show herself industrious and a good manager; third, she must always be very neat in her dress; and, fourth, she must not dress above her station—for that will drive away lovers rather than attract them. When a girl has a lover to her taste, what must she do not to lose him?—She must love him truly, speak to him kindly, be always in good humour before him, and not coquette too much with his rivals. When a girl is demanded in marriage what ought she to say?—She ought to appear very much surprised, and then to say that she was not aware that a person for whom she had so much respect had ever thought of her."

A house painter in London grained a door so exactly in imitation of oak, that last year it put forth a quantity of leaves, and grew an excellent crop of acorns.

FANNY FERN ON HUSBANDS AND WIVES.—"If your husband looks grave, let him alone; don't disturb or annoy him." Oh, pshaw! when I'm married, the soberer my husband looked, the more fun I'd rattle about his ears. "Don't disturb him!" I guess so! I'd salt his coffee, and pepper his tea, and sugar his beefsteak, and tread on his toes, and hide his newspaper, and sew up his pockets, and wouldn't stop for the Great Mogul, till I had shortened his face to my liking. Certainly he'd "get vexed"—there wouldn't be any fun in teasing him if he didn't—and that would give his melancholy blood a good healthful start, and his eyes would snap and sparkle, and he'd say: "Fanny, will you be quiet or not?" and I should laugh and pull his whiskers, and say, decidedly, "Not!" and then I should tell him I hadn't the slightest idea how handsome he looked when he was vexed—and then he would pretend not to hear the compliment, but would pull up his dickey, and take a sly peep in the glass (for all that!) and then he'd begin to grow amiable, and get off his stilts, and be just as agreeable all the rest of the evening as if he wasn't my husband—and all because I didn't follow that stupid advice, "to let him alone." Just as if I didn't know! Just imagine me, Fanny, sitting down on a cricket in the corner, with my forefinger in my mouth, looking out of the sides of my eyes, and waiting till that man got ready to speak to me! You can see at once it would be—be. Well, the amount of it is, I shouldn't do it.

AN UNINTENTIONAL LISTENER.—Some two miles up the river from St. Johnsbury, Vermont, is a primitive sort of a little village called "The Centre." Here, not long since, the rustic youth of the vicinity congregated for a "dance"—and dance they did," said our informant, "with an unction unknown to your city belles and beaux." One interesting young man having "imbibed" rather too freely, became "fatigued" in the course of the evening, and wisely concluded to "retire for a short rest." A door ajar near the dancing-hall revealed, invitingly, a glimpse of a comfortable bed, of which he took possession, with the prospect of an undisturbed "snooze." It so happened, however, that this was the "ladies' withdrawing-room"—and no sooner had he closed his eyes, than a pair of blooming damsels came in from the hall, and began adjusting their disordered ringlets, the dim light of the tallow candle not disclosing the tenant of the bed. The girls had tongues (like most of their "seck") which ran on in this wise: "What a nice dance we're having! Have you heard anybody say anything about me, Jane?" "La, yes, Sally! Jim Brown says he never see you look so handsome as you do to-night. Have you heard anybody say anything about me?" "About you? Why sartin; I heard Joe Flint tell Sam Jones that you was the prettiest-dressed girl in the room." Whereupon the dear things chuckled, "fixed up" a little more, and made off towards the ball-room. They had hardly reached the door, when our half-conscious friend raised himself upon his elbow, and quite intelligibly, though slowly, inquired: "Have you heard anything about me, gals?"

HOW THE WIDOW TOLD THE BACHELOR, AND THE BACHELOR TOLLED THE WIDOW.—Snow had fallen; the young of the village had got up a grand sleighing party to a country tavern at some distance; and the interesting Widow Lambkin sat in the same sleigh, under the same buffalo robe as myself. "Oh—oh! don't!" she exclaimed, as we came to the first bridge, catching me by the arm, and turning her veiled face towards me, while her little eyes twinkled through the moonlight. "Don't what?" I asked; "I'm not going to do anything." "Well, but I thought you were going to 'take toll,'" replied Mrs. Lambkin. "Toll!" I rejoined; "what's that?" "How!" exclaimed the widow, her clear laugh ringing out above the music of the bells; "Dr. Meadows pretends he don't know what toll is!" "Indeed, I don't, then!" I said, laughing in turn. "Don't know that the gentlemen, when they go on a sleighing party, claim a kiss as toll, when they cross a bridge? Well, I never!" When next we came to a bridge, and I claimed toll, the struggles of the widow to hold the veil were not sufficient to tear it; and somehow, when the veil was removed, her face was turned directly towards my own, and in the glittering of the moonlight, the horse trotting on himself, toll was taken for the first time in his life by Dr. Meadows. Soon we came to a long bridge; but the widow said it was no use to resist, and she paid up as we reached it without a struggle. "But you won't take toll for every arch, will you, doctor?" she asked. To which the only reply was a practical affirmative to the question. Did you ever, reader, sleigh-ride with a widow, and take toll at the bridges?

THE BEST METHOD OF DISPENSING MEDICINE.—Dispensing with it altogether.—Punch.

THE DOOM OF WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.—The Act has at length passed for the total destruction of Westminster Bridge, and another bridge is to succeed, which, if it is really to succeed, must be as unlike as possible to the existing bridge, which has been a complete failure. The career of this bridge has been downward from the first, and its continuance has been a phenomenon similar to that which is illustrated by the old saying, that "a creaking door hangs long upon the hinges." Westminster Bridge has been, as long as we can remember, "going, going, going;" and it has been a matter of constant wonder that it had never yet "gone." We have never, on traversing it, been able to look back upon it with the respect due to "the bridge that carries us safely over;" for we have always felt that the safety was due rather to good fortune than to any merit the bridge itself had to rest upon. We cannot help feeling delight that an Act of Parliament will at last put this unhappy old bridge out of its misery, instead of sanctioning the further infliction of the painful operations to which it has been subjected. The poor old bridge is no longer to be maimed and mutilated, but it is to be made away with once and for ever. It has already undergone the process of trepanning, by having something removed from its crown, and it has long ago been able to boast of nothing better than wooden legs, by the process of giving it timbers to stand upon, as well as wooden arms, by the substitution of wood-work for its old original balustrades. We are delighted that the old nuisance will not be suffered to die in its bed, or rather in the bed of the river, into which it daily threatened to tumble. Westminster Bridge has, indeed, had a fair trial, for it has been tried by its piers, and its condemnation has been the inevitable result, for its piers have been, perhaps, the chief cause of its downfall.—Ibid.

CURE FOR A CUT.—Buy a new suit of clothes.—Ibid.

THE FASHIONABLE EPIDEMIC.—There is a curious epidemic flying about—we hardly know what it is—but it attacks principally the highest and the middle classes. So very contagious is it, and so certain in its effects, that, to our knowledge alone, no less than 5632 families, principally residing, at the West End, have been ordered by their physicians to leave town immediately, for "change of air."—Ibid.

WALLS HAVE TEARS.—A complaint against damp houses has been recently made by a letter-writer in the Times, who says he has suffered severely from wet walls. We are happy in suggesting an efficient remedy, by recommending that the walls of new houses should be papered with Parliamentary speeches, the usual dryness of which would, we are convinced, render any little dampness impossible.—Ibid.

PASSPORTS IMPROVED.—There was a talk of passports being issued with photographic portraits. Men may not object to this plan, as they do not care so much for a little disfigurement; but we doubt strongly if ladies will ever give their countenances to it. It is well known that photographic portraits do not improve the beauty of any one. They give the features of the "human face divine," but without the slightest touch of flattery. Worse than this, if there should be any little defect, the cruel metal does not trouble itself in the least to conceal it, but has the vulgarity to render it in all its staring obliquity or deformity. We have our fears, therefore, that this very unfashionable system of portrait painting will never suit the ladies. It goes upon the Antipodean theory of making the pretty faces appear ugly, and the ugly ones still uglier. We are confident that no lady who has any respect for herself, or her husband, will face such an ordeal. Some other plan must be invented by the police, or else there will be an end to all travelling on the part of our ladies. Where is the woman who would care about going abroad, when she was liable to be stopped at every minute, and forced to produce, for the amusement of some coarse gendarme, an ugly photographic portrait of herself? We propose, therefore, that the following system be adopted: Let M. Baugniet, or some other artist as clever in taking portraits, be constantly in attendance at the passport office. He would strike off a likeness in a very short time—such a likeness as delicately flattered, the lady herself would take a positive pleasure in producing every time she was asked for it. It would be an elegant work of art; which the lady would like, probably, to preserve by her, and the possession of which would also materially enhance the pleasures of travelling. All the expenses to be paid, of course, by the State—for it would be a most ungracious action to ask a lady to pay for her own portrait—or else to be defrayed by the railways, or steam-packets, of the country which the fair traveller intended to visit. The companies would be amply repaid by the influx of passengers, besides having the enviable privilege of claiming copies of all their female visitors. An ample profit, even, might be realised by selling the lithographs—for a lady might be allowed to claim as many copies of her likeness as she pleased, upon the understanding that all copies beyond the one which was given to her for the necessary police purposes of travelling, were to be paid for. A large revenue might be derived from this branch of the passport system—for what lady would hesitate to take a hundred copies of herself, if she was made extremely handsome?—Ibid.

TO PERSONS ABOUT TO MARRY.—The Liverpool Mercury states, that a Mr. Cooke, of Leicester, intends starting an excursion train to Scotland, which he intends shall stay sufficiently long at Gretna Green to allow of passengers being married. That Cooke is a genius no one will surely have the hardihood to deny: the result of this speculation will unhesitatingly attest the fact. A tremendous rush, such as has never before been witnessed, may be fairly anticipated; and numbers, no doubt, will be disappointed in obtaining tickets either for love or money, even though, in many instances, it may be a single fair. Obdurate guardians, also, and anxious mothers, may be expected to make overtures to a pretty tune to the originator of this scheme, to induce him to abandon the speculation which he has in train; and we prognosticate that the columns of the Times about that period will be replete with cabalistic advertisements, imploring deluded relatives to return immediately by a return ticket. As we have not yet discovered any woman foolish enough to ally her fortune to ours, we entertain serious ideas of taking a ticket ourselves—so that, in the event of our remarking any young lady with a superabundant quantity of heavy luggage, we may be in a position to make a proposition instantly to lend her a hand. In order to render the undertaking complete, we understand that, upon nearing the Gretna Green Station, the railway officials have received instructions to cry "Gentlemen! get your wedding-rings ready!" and clergymen will be stationed in the refreshment room to provide the requisite spiritual consolation.—Diogenes.

A REAL CHINESE PUZZLE.—Many of our friends are acquainted with the Chinese puzzles, which are so difficult to put together, and which are generally considered the most ingenious and troublesome things ever invented. We were requested the other day to do for words what the Chinese mechanics had done for wooden forms, and to produce a riddle of Chinese origin which it should be utterly impossible to guess. After half a second's calm reflection, we came out with the following: Q. Why may it be supposed that the capital of China and a town in China belonging to the English, possess the finest selection of everything? A. Because they are always Peking and Chusan (which, being interpreted, means "picking and choosing").—Ibid.

Giv is not only a mockery and a delusion, but (as you will see in the Dictionary) also a snare.—Ibid.

MAXIMS FOR CARMEN.

If you want oats for your horses you must cease giving chaff to your passengers.

If you don't bate your charges you can't bait your chargers.

If you must no longer skin the public, you must go a mile for a tanner.—Ibid.

SOME people think that Czar Nicholas will, as regards the treaties of 1815, be himself the Arbitrator.—Ibid.

SIXPENCE is the allowance per mile of Ministers, and therefore it is called the Cabbie "net"-fare!—Ibid.

SONG OF THE HAT-TURNER.

All round the hat we form magnetic circles,—

All round the hat, for a great part of the day;

And if any one asks us the way in which we turn it,

It's done by pushing gently, if you all push one way.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HOW TO GET OUT IF THE HOUSE IS ON FIRE.—In the course of a recent inquest in London, Mr. Wakley, the coroner, observed, that it would be well to acquaint the public with the fact, that if persons in a house on fire had the presence of mind to apply a damp cloth or handkerchief to their mouth and nostrils, they could effect a passage through the densest smoke; but the surest mode would be to envelope the head and face completely in the damp cloth.

A MONSTER TRAVELLING CARRIAGE.—A crowd of curious gazers was assembled on the Quai d'Orleans around a wagon, which, from its size and proportions, might well be called the Imperial wagon. It was neither more nor less than a residence, with every convenience, including a dining-room, a bedchamber, with its appurtenances, a kitchen, a cool cellar, in which fifty bottles of wine can be kept in iced water; in short, everything which can be desired in a comfortable residence. This caravan has been built to the order of M. le Comte de C—, who superintended its construction at the factory of M. Polincran. The proprietor intends it for his own use and that of his family, and will shortly set out on a tour of Europe. Its completion has cost 44,000 francs.

EXTRAORDINARY SITE OF A TREE.—At the village of Witherly, in Leicestershire, seven miles from Market Bosworth, a gooseberry tree, with a stalk as thick as a stout man's thumb, and the bush from four to five feet in diameter, may be seen springing out of the joint in the stone wall of the church tower, at a height of eighty-four feet from the ground. It has grown there for a century or more, thriving greatly in moist seasons, and dwindling and pining during the drought. The seed was probably dropped where it has germinated by a bird. Mr. W. Ward, of Hylton Street, who has known this curiously-situated tree for more than fifty years, has shown us a strong offshoot taken from it the other day, and some good sized gooseberries which it bore.—Worcester Chronicle.

THE SAXON SHILLING.—A recruiting sergeant of the Royal Marines was sent to this part of the country, a short time since, to enrol such tidy boys as he could pick up. He opened his batteries at Rostrevor, where he remained for six weeks, but during that time didn't get as much as one solitary offer. He next tried Newry, and, after ten days' marching and countermarching, it was worse luck with him: he couldn't even get a promising-looking spalpeen to bid him the time of day. As a last resource, he headed to Dundalk, but there he was, if possible, still more luckless. For eight weary days did he pace its rough-paved streets, cane in hand, and ribbons flying, but not as much as a "how do you do" could he extract from "the boys"—and so he left in disappointment and despair. This is one of the fruits of emigration—certainly not the worst—but when we know that for want of labour the land of Ireland is neglected—running to bog and wild common—people ought to think a little more than they do upon this question.

THE SWEARING ROOM.—A short time since, a genteelly-dressed man, and having all the appearance of a gentleman, walked into the bar-room of one of our most respectable hotels, and—perhaps by way of showing his consequence—strutted about the room, asking questions, and interlarding his language with an amount of oaths, especially annoying to the landlord and several other persons present. The landlord at last went to him, and, quietly calling him aside, told him that the language he was using was exceedingly disagreeable in that place; further, that there was a private room, particularly fitted up, which was called the "swearing room," and if he would only go there, he might swear to his heart's content. The stranger took the rebuke kindly, and no more swearing was heard from his lips at that time.—Baltimore Sun.

EXTRAORDINARY ACCIDENT.—An extraordinary accident occurred at Latton, near Cricklade, lately. It appears that the Rev. George Master, of Cirencester, had just arrived at the vicarage, accompanied by Lady Carteret and several children. Scarcely had her ladyship alighted from the carriage, when one of the horses, in throwing its head up and down, caught the bar of the bit in the pole of the carriage, and, not being able quickly to extricate itself, the mullin was slipped off in the struggle, which so frightened the horse that he started off at a furious rate—his companion joining in the race. At the end of the avenue the entrance-gate was closed; but both horses took it in a leap and cleared it, and the carriage wheels, coming immediately in contact, smashed the gate, but passed over it, without any damage of consequence to the vehicle. The horses were almost immediately stopped by the coolness and nerve of Mr. Master, who had all this time retained his seat and the reins, and thus miraculously escaped unhurt.—Wilt's Mirror.

CURIOUS SNAKE STORY.—Marie Janze, wife of a farmer of Tarascon, went a few days ago to wash her linen in the Ariège, taking her child with her. All at once she saw a snake a yard and a half long, which made a spring at her, attracted probably by the smell of milk from her breast, she being a wet-nurse. The reptile attempted to enter her mouth, but, not being able to do so, wound itself round her neck, and bit her severely. The terrified woman made efforts to pull it from her neck, and her son, uttering piercing cries, hastened to her assistance. At last she succeeded in casting the snake from her; but, instead of taking to flight, it looked furiously at her, and raised itself as if preparing to spring. The woman, dreadfully frightened, shrieked wildly. A young man came up, and, boldly attacking the reptile with a stick, succeeded in killing it. If the woman had been left to herself, she would probably have died from convulsions caused by fear. As it is, serious consequences may ensue. Her face bears the mark of the reptile's bite, and her neck is scratched by its folds.—French Paper.

A CHEAPER LIGHT THAN GAS.—On the road leading to the port, we were forcibly struck by a spectacle which our stay of two years, in the hottest part of the tropics, might have rendered familiar to us; but previously I had nowhere seen such an innumerable quantity of phosphorescent insects. The grass that overspread the ground, the branches and foliage of the trees, all shone with that reddish and moveable light, which varies in its intensity at the will of the animal by which it is produced. It seemed as though the starry firmament reposed on the savannah. In the hut of the poorest inhabitant of the country, fifteen cocuyos, placed in a calabash pierced with holes, afford sufficient light to search for anything during the night. To shake the calabash forcibly is all that is necessary to excite the animal to increase the intensity of the luminous discs situated on each side of its body. The people of the country remark, with a simple truth of expression, that calabashes filled with cocuyos are lanterns always ready lighted. They are, in fact, only extinguished by the sickness or death of the insects, which are easily fed with a little sugar-cane. A young woman at Trinidad de Cuba told us, that during a long and difficult passage from the main-land, she always made use of the phosphorescence of the cocuyos when she gave suck to her child at night. The captain of the ship would allow no other light on board, for fear of the corsairs.—Humboldt's Travels.

WONDERFUL MECHANISM IN THE EYES OF BIRDS.—A singular provision is made for keeping the surface of the bird's eye clean—for wiping the glass of the instrument, as it were, and also for protecting it, while rapidly flying through the air and through thickets, without hindering the sight. Birds are for these purposes furnished with a third eyelid—a fine membrane or skin, which is constantly moved very rapidly over the eyeball, by two muscles placed in the back of the eyes. One of the muscles ends in a loop, the other in a string which goes through the loop, and is fixed in the corner of the membrane, to pull it backward and forward. If you wish to draw a thing towards any place with the least force, you must pull directly in the line between the thing and the place; but if you wish to draw it as quickly as possible, and with the most convenience, and do not regard the loss of force, you must pull it obliquely, by drawing it in two directions at once. Tie a string to a stone, and draw it towards you with one hand; then make a loop on another string, and, running the first through it, draw one string in one hand, not towards you, but sideways, till both strings are in a straight line: you will see how much more easily the stone moves quickly than it did before, when pulled straight forward.—Brougham's Miscellaneous.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

TERRY.—According to the last census, the population of Bradford was 66,508; of Hull, 65,670.

H. B.—The wages of seamen in the merchant navy are reckoned by the month; but to the Australian ports, since the gold discoveries, it has become common to bargain for the run out and home.

JACOBUS.—A gentleman invited to a young lady's birthday party, is not necessarily expected to make her a present. That would depend on the nature of his acquaintanceship with the family. Were he an old and familiar friend he might take the liberty—not otherwise. Good handwriting.

W. Y. S.—Raspberry vinegar is easily made. Mix a quart of vinegar with a quart of red raspberries, mashed; let it stand nine days, or longer, if it has not fermented; then strain it through a fine sieve, and to every pint of liquid add three-quarters of a pound of fine sugar; simmer it gently, and finish by boiling quickly for twenty minutes.

REBEKAH.—Logwood and green copperas are commonly used to make a black dye, but the colour is improved by first boiling the article in a decoction of galls and alder bark. If previously dyed blue or brown, by means of walnut-park, it will be still better.

J. WILLIAMS.—The law of divorce remains in the same state. In the next session of Parliament some alterations may be attempted; but we are sorry to have to inform you that not one of the recommendations of the commissioners appointed to inquire into and report upon the subject, will be of the slightest utility to the working classes.

DROOPING LILY.—Lovers at college are rarely loyal to their boyish feelings or engagements. In a new world they acquire new thoughts and habits. Dissipation is one of the latter. You would do well to familiarise yourself with the idea that his affection has evaporated. It could only have been a boyish sentiment, and that, we all know, soon yields to circumstances and a more extended experience. Depend upon it, it will not be worth your while to think of him but as one dead to you.

W. H.—In walking in the streets of the metropolis, always keep to the right hand. Custom has firmly established the rule, which should be strictly obeyed by both sexes, and never broken, even when a lady is in the case.

W. O. S. has a sweetheart, who, in her letters and manner, is cold and constrained. His friend, on the contrary, corresponds with a girl who is warm and frank. He requests to know which we think the most likely to be true and tender in affection? We should say both would; but, after marriage, the cold sweetheart would probably be the most loving wife. Matrimony thaws the frostiest of hearts. Your frank, "true lover," like girls, not having much ice to thaw, are not so impressive in this respect. A good deal of the sentiment evaporates during courtship. The cold, haughty girl, on the contrary, when metamorphosed into a wife, steps into quite a new existence—her dormant susceptibilities are roused into action, and she becomes the most passionately attached spouse that the most anxious husband could desire. The mode in which the feelings find expression rests with the temperament; and, as a woman's education is not completed until she has been married and had a child, her behaviour and manner during courtship is not to be taken as an infallible index to her future character and disposition.

HARRIET asks in what way she can pass the dull evenings in the country? She requires something to enliven her spirits. The society of a lover would be a radical remedy; but as she appears in that respect to be a neglected and destitute young lady, we recommend some useful study. Drawing, music, and books, unless the temperament is sanguine, soon pall upon the taste. Needlework is also monotonous, but these occupations might be combined with some novel pursuits. A game of chess with an old bachelor would be a relief; but if there is not one at hand, why something else must be resorted to. We can think of nothing at present but the study of some science. Within the past few years, chemistry has been very popular with ladies who find time hanging heavily on their hands.

TWENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE.—Every man must expect to be thwarted in love once in his life-time. This kind of disappointment seems designed by Providence for the development of his real character. So that you are only undergoing a natural experience. But for your comfort, we must inform you that first love is not always real love—it is more frequently only a sentiment, a passion, depending more on the imagination than anything else for sustenance. It is a storm sent to clear the sultry atmosphere of character of mists and delusions. By-and-bye you will see and reason with more distinctness.

AMY LAWRENCE.—An oath is an invocation to the Deity, to testify to the truth or falsehood of a statement, to witness a pledge, a promise, or an engagement. Its solemnity is only excelled by its awful responsibility. A promise or declaration not ratified by oath, is a matter that concerns the individual conscience. An oath, on the contrary, appeals to, and affects the universal conscience.

GEORGE ST. CLAIR.—Your grief for the loss of your friend is ridiculous. A lover lamenting the perfidy of his mistress, could not be more hyperbolically nonsensical. Be a man. Return scorn for scorn. Reciprocate the "cut," and for the future do not be too hasty in forming friendships. A fine exterior often covers a black interior—"A goodly apple may be rotten at the core."

ROBERT MORRIS.—Dislike at first sight is quite as possible as love at first sight. Some temperaments repel—others attract. A nervous, bilious person will not be much disposed to like a red-haired, sanguine, bilious person—and the reverse. Their instincts will not fraternise, hence the sudden repugnance. But in this matter the moral qualities are brought to bear. Vice taints the whole constitution—it affects the manner, the voice, the tone—indeed, it peeps out in a thousand different ways. An honourable man brought into contact with this diseased moral organisation, feels that is so: his inner man consequently draws back from that of the other, and doubt and mistrust take possession of him. It is the same with frank natures having minds similarly disposed. They meet, and there is at once a mutual attraction. Their natures harmonise; but where there is no harmony, there must be repulsion.

ALICE DE BURGH.—Hatchments should correspond to the rank, sex, position, &c., of the deceased. When a bachelor dies, his arms and crest are painted single or quartered, but never impaled; the ground of the hatchment under the shield is all black. When a maiden dies, her arms (but no crest) must be placed in a lozenge, and may be single or quartered, with the ground under the escutcheon all black. When a married man dies, his arms are impaled with his wife's, the ground of the hatchment under his side of the shield is black, his wife's is white; the black side signifies the husband to be dead, and the white side that the wife is living. When a married woman dies, her arms are impaled with her husband's (but no crest), the ground of the hatchment under her side of the shield is black, that of the husband white, to denote that he is living. When a widower dies, his arms are impaled with those of his deceased wife, with his crest, the ground of the hatchment to be all black; the same in the case of a widow, with the exception of the crest. When the man or woman is the last of a family, the death's-head supplies the place of a crest. This is to signify that death has conquered all.

UNHAPPY EMMA must trust in the Providence which never deserts the true and faithful among her loving sex. The friend she pines for is a husband, and as she possesses beauty, talents, and amiability, she may be assured she will neither wish in vain, nor long. As the bright sunshine of a summer's morn brushes away the darkness of night, so does love, when once it has touched the heart, dispel the shadows which have gathered round it, and bestow upon it the celestial fire which turns all it touches to gold—the gold of everlasting life.

HARDWICKE GREEN.—Idleness is the greatest bane of society, as well as of individuals. It corrodes all it touches. The idle man produces nothing, yet he is always in mischief, always potent for evil, yet powerless for good. He is an incumbrance to himself and everybody else, until finally used up in the sheer exhaustion, the ashes of the false charity on which he has subsisted. To society at large, idleness is a cancer eating its way into the heart and soul, until the whole community is affected and ulcerated to the core. The crime—for in its consequences it is a great crime—is always found in the extremes of civilisation, among the very rich and the very poor. The middle and operative classes are never idle. If they were, productive organisation would soon come to an end—Europe would be one vast lazarus-house. Happily for civilisation and the world—indeed every great interest—idleness is the exception, and the countries afflicted with it are a curse and a warning to the rest of mankind.

MARY HOWARD.—You ask us, do we believe in the secret infidelity of men of genius? We do not. There is a certain class of minds which nourishes that plague to every kind of society—atheism—but they are only of the third-rate order, as regards intellectual development. They are generally imperfectly educated persons, with facilities out of which neither education nor circumstances could extract greatness. The man of undoubted genius cannot be an atheist. His soul is too large for suspicion, his capacity too ample for the low opinion, that the present life begins and ends the mission of mankind. It is the little, half-trained minds that doubt. They are neither the ignorant, nor the intellectual—but the half-breeds, the pious, who, like mules, are vicious and mischievous. Minds of majesty and power look beyond the narrow limits of this existence, into worlds upon worlds of beauty and excellence. To them is given visions of immortality, of graduated perfection ending in something inconceivably grand, as well as lovely. Sceptics are not gifted with this Divine power of perception. They grovel in their present nature, and really would seem to be unworthy of any other.

AMATOR asks what we think of the conduct of a young lady with whom he is on familiar terms, who blushes deeply every time they chance to meet, but who, nevertheless, has more than once wounded his feelings by publicly preferring another's society to his, notwithstanding his most urgent protest. Why, that the girl is not insensible to his merit—in fact, loves him—but is a bit of a coquette. Remonstrance with such giddy creatures is out of the question—for a coquette is as perverse as a certain animal. If you try to pull her back, she is sure to go on. Our advice is, to leave her to her girlish folly—it will cure itself. Assume quite a gay, buoyant manner towards her. Thorough indifference is the only dagger that will wound the heart of a flirt, and when once wounded, regrets mingle with its flutterings, and gradually a purer and more womanly feeling begins to pervade her nature.

ARNO.—In heraldry, the supporters are exterior ornaments, placed at the sides of the escutcheon, to support it. They are chiefly animals and birds. The royal supporters, since King James I., have been a lion and unicorn. But the sovereigns of England, from Edward III. to Queen Elizabeth, bore their supporters as follows:

Edward III.	A Lion and Eagle.
Richard II.	Not known.
Henry IV.	White Antelope and White Swan.
Henry V.	Lion and Antelope.
Henry VI.	The same.
Edward IV.	Lion and Black Bull.
Edward V.	Yellow Lion and White Lion.
Richard III.	Yellow Lion and White Boar.
Henry VII.	Lion and Red Dragon.
Henry VIII.	Lion and Silver Greyhound.
Mary	Lion and Greyhound
Elizabeth	The same.

W. WINDER.—To our surprise, we find that the Bishop's Court, at Manchester, does not yet possess testamentary jurisdiction. So that the will of a person dying at Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, would have to be proved before a surrogate of the Chancellor of Chester, and the probate would have to issue in his name and under his seal, from the court at Chester, as has been the custom for centuries past. But the will of a person dying at Bolton, near Lancaster, in Lancashire, would have to be proved before one of the surrogates of the commissary, and the probate issue in his name and under his seal, from the Consistory Court at Lancaster.

JOHN JARMAN, of Longsight, near Manchester, has patented an ingenious machine for measuring corn, seed, pulse, &c. The apparatus consists of a cylinder, round which is fixed external projections, on which revolves, by means of pins or screws, another cylinder, which forms the measure—the top of the bottom cylinder being the bottom of the measure—the projections being fixed at given distances: so that each rim, on which the top cylinder may rest, shows, on an index written in front, the exact measure contained. Large sizes are manufactured with the rims or projections on a graduated scale, the top cylinder revolving round instead of dropping into each. The apparatus is provided with a sliding door—so that the produce is at once transferred. The advantages claimed are, its accuracy, simplicity, and that any quantity can be measured by a single apparatus.

ROBERT THE WORKMAN.—On the subject of strikes, we have hesitated to pronounce an opinion, because, while our sympathy has been with the representatives of labour, we have felt that the representatives of capital had some claim to consideration: Certainly, if the question is looked at from without, the working classes are the principals, the capitalists the subordinates. But as both, de facto and de jure, the capitalists are the masters and the labourers the servants, it would be absurd to take so narrow a view of the conflicting claims of the rival parties as to say that, when the majority wills it, the minority must yield. That would not be sound political economy; but when we hear the City Police Commissioner contends that wages do not and ought not to rise and fall with the prices of provisions; we can turn round upon him, and not only question his judgment, but ask him what is it that does really regulate the wages remuneration? When a good goose could be bought for a groat, the wages of a labourer were a penny a day. Now, as the money value of everything is higher, wages are necessarily higher. The fact is, that labour is as marketable a commodity as any other—and as it falls with the exigencies of the time, so by the same rule it must rise. But the question is not thoroughly understood on either side, and until it is, its solution must be adjourned sine die. Our own impression is, that the scale of wages ought to be regulated by legal assessment. At present it is sought to be adjusted by combinations and strikes—a most unwise proceeding—for those are violent expedients which injure both parties. It will be a long time, however, before an equitable principle in the matter is established. The laissez faire principle is all-powerful in society just at present, and no one can see the end of its reign.

E. A. IRE.—You have mistaken friendship for love—an error very common among girls of susceptibility and retired habits. The best cure is to think yourself too good for such a shilly-shally nincompoop.

ELLEN AND HER BROTHER.—The classes to which plants belong, may easily be ascertained by an inspection of the stamens and pistils. The latter are in the centre of the flower, and the former surround the pistils. The terms used, are andria for stamens, and gynia for pistils. The little prefixes Mon, Di, Tri, Tetr, Pent, Hex, Hept, Oct, Enne, Dec, &c., are derived from the Greek numerals, and mean, one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, and ten: so that if the student finds a flower with one stamen and two pistils, the class to which it belongs will be Monandria, and the order Digynia; if with two stamens and three pistils, the class will be Diandria, and the order Trigynia; if with three stamens and two pistils, the class will be Triandria, and the order Digynia; if with four stamens and one pistil, the class will be Tetrandria, and the order Monogynia; if with five stamens and five pistils, the class will be Pentandria, and the order Pentagynia; if with six stamens and many pistils—i.e., more than can be easily counted—the class will be Hexandria, and the order Polygynia, because Poly means many; if with seven stamens and four pistils, the class will be Heptandria, and the order Tetragynia; if with eight stamens and one pistil, the class will be Octandria, and the order Monogynia; if with nine stamens and six pistils, the class will be Enneandria, and the order Hexagynia; if with ten stamens and ten pistils, the class will be Decandria, and the order Decagynia.

JAMES REYNOLDS.—The expense of carrying out your suggestion would materially interfere with its practicability; but we think that if the state of the weather every day, in the large towns and the different places of resort for health and pleasure, were known at some central spot in the metropolis—Charing Cross for instance—it would be a great public convenience. To excursionists the information would be invaluable, and we think the railway companies would be materially benefited by such diurnal meteorological reports.

R. A. D.—Either the Aztecs—so called—are impostitions—children of the "What is it?" tribe, or they are abortions, picked up among the Mexican Indians. If they are neither, they are, as we contended in our article, not Aztecs, but descendants of a race that the Aztecs and Toltecs subjugated. In support of this view, we are presented with the fact, that the Mexican language is not generally spoken in Central America—or, we should say, Guatemala. There are no fewer than twenty dialects peculiar to Guatemala, and the difference between many of them is remarkable. Again, the Spanish historians never believed that this territory was ever subject to Mexico. They relate, that on one occasion the ambassadors of Mexico were dismissed, because the King of Quiche could not understand their language. Humboldt says: "When the Toltecs arrived in Guatemala, they found the country already inhabited by various tribes. The remains of these aboriginal tribes, who appear to have been driven southward, are probably still in existence" &c. so that, taking the statement put forth by the exhibitors on its ex parte merits, the theory advanced by us has an appearance of greater probability than the one which assigns them to the Aztec variety of the human family, of which there are millions still in existence.

NEW NOVEL IN "THE WEEKLY TIMES."

On Saturday, August 28, were Commenced Chapters I. and II. of a New Tale, entitled

A PANORAMA OF LIFE.

BY OLIVER TEMPLE,
Author of "The Hunchback's Legacy," &c., &c.

"A PANORAMA OF LIFE" is one of the most remarkable Narratives in the English Language, and, like all Oliver Temple's works, contains scenes of great interest and beauty.
